GRACIOUS

When Senator Frank O'Connell announced his retirement from the Pennsylvania Senate, Lemmond was encouraged by Patrick J. Solano, Republican Party strategist, to throw his hat into the ring for the vacant Senate seat.

Michael MacDowell, president of Misericordia University, was good friends with the late senator, and praised the work Lemmond has done and the legacy he's left on the community.

"What Charlie was able to do - he was a very, very bright man with quite an intellect - was that he never wore (his intelligence) on his sleeve," said MacDowell. "He never appeared or acted as if he was any different than the constituents he served, and that's the sign of a true statesman. He never, ever, ever talked down to anyone - that wasn't Charlie."

Lemmond's name graces the main theater of the university, a legacy MacDowell believes fits into the mission of the school. "Service to community and service to others was absolutely essential (to Lemmond), and that's what Misericordia stands for," he said.

Lemmond was an ace trumpet player in college and loved jazz music. The Boston Brass played during the dedication of the Lemmond Theater in honor of the late senator.

Lemmond and his family also aided the Back Mountain Memorial Library, especially during its annual auction.

Carol Sweeney, a library auction volunteer for 10 years and chief of staff to state Rep. Karen Boback, said Charles and Barbara Lemmond were great champions of the library.

"He will long be remembered for his contributions to not just library but so many other entities, foundations, buildings and project," she said. "What a gracious man."
