you use," she said.

Thirteen-year-old Maranda Moosic, of Lake Township, chose yet another extreme climate to study - the desert.

She was surprised by all the different types of animals that lived in the dry, desolate terrain - she didn't think there would be many at all.

"There's a bobcat, a kangaroo rat, a big-horned sheep, a thorny devil lizard, the pancake prickly pear cactus," she said, pointing to all the animals in an aquarium she used to model the desert.

"It was surprising to learn that toads are in the desert," said Moosic. "I know they aren't in water like frogs, but they are more towards water, and there isn't much water in the desert."

Moosic said science is interesting because it affects everyday life.

"I think it's neat that everything is made of atoms," she said.
