The prevention of collisions at sea is a favored subject, though it has almost been solved by a device which can best be described as two burn [] doors, one hinged on each side of the ship near the bow. All that is necessary when a collision at sea is imminent is to pull on a rope and open the barn doors-sgainst the pressure of the water-The model worked beautifully in a both tub, but after a few months careful thought and calculation, it would appear to an expert that on a vessel going eighteen or twenty knots, something would happen when those barn doors were opened, either to the man the rope or the doors.

To prevent vessels running aground many inventors have exercised their mightiest powers and the most satisfactory one so far is that of putting glass windows in the bottom of the ship so that the bottom of the harbor can be seen and timely warning given of shoal water. I, however, have no desire to be on the lookout at the glass window when
