GRANDPA BATES

"So you think grandpa and grandma have had a romance in their lives, do you children? Well, as you've found me cut, I suppose I'll have to sit down and tell you the whole story." Sturdy old Grandpa Bates, whom everybody in Harrisville loved, honor ed and venerated, sat down in the large, time-worn rocking-chair which had been presented to him on his wed-ding day and grazed down at his two grandchildren, who with eager, ex-pectant gaze awaited the beginning of his store.

"When I was but twelve years old I moved from Canada to Harrisville, Western Massachusetts. I was put in the same class with your grandmother at school. But I hated girls; that is, until three years after my entrance into that chass.

"One day my eye rested on Ruth Ashford, which was your grandina's more then. She was hard to work over a difficult problem in mathematics. Her flushed checks were the pi ture of girlich innecence and beauty and a light-bine dress served to highten the color. I was smitten, I, who had always been foremost in deriding and riddenline any commands who 5 00 had always been foremost in deriding and ridiculing any companion who might be taken with the charms of feminity, fell head over heels in boylish love. Your grandma reciprocated ray affections, and many were the likestal hours we spent together.

9 51 "Was fort was our lappiness. Little's mother was a woman of the world. She had other views for her daughter than the son of a shoemaker. So it was that I was forblidden to see world. She had other views for her daughter than the sen of a shoemaker. So it was that I was forbidden to see or hear from my beloved.

"I forseak my old companions and hamns, became silent and melancholy, and acted in such a manner that my parents grew frightened at the depths of what they considered a boyish, temperary passion.

"Finally they bundled me off to Texas, where the change of scene, outfoor life and activity were pronounced a sure cure for love-sickness.

"Six years I passed in the wilds of Texas. The sting of the separation from my darling gradually were off, but in its place there came that deepert affection which lasted from that lay to this. My twenty-first birthday same, and I resolved to go home, to wanter over the spots where in comments with my loved one I whiled away the idle hours of youth.

"My long fourney ended I burst in on we falls cone day while they were at the lifle bours of youth.

"My long journey ended I burstinon my folks one day while they were at linner. For about an hour I did nothing but ask and answer questions; but not one word was spoken about the girl who was nearest my beart, whom I had travelled all the way home to I had travelled all the way home to

"Were they trying to conceal some-thing from me? Had something hap-pened to my darling while I was away? Had she got married? Oh, God! the thought was enough to drive one mad.

"At last I found a chance to ask mother how Ruth was getting along. In trembling tones the answered: 'My poor boy, you must prepare for a great shock. Six weeks ago Ruth was taken ill with typhoid fever, and though she has rallied at times, the report to-day is that she is dying.'

has railied at times, the report to-day is that she is dying."

"I waited to hear no more, but seized my hat and rushed from the house. One object was before me. I must reach her bedside before she died. I reached the gate leading to the Ashford's house, and in my blind haste almost knocked over Dr. Duffield, who had just arrived to see his patient. I introduced myself, and then begged him to hurry down and acquaint me with any news of the slek girl. I had not long to wait. In a few moments be came back, and even before he spoke I knew my darling was dying.

"Oh the agony of that moment. I begged permission of Mrs. Ashford to see Ruth, and as the doctor acquiesced my loon was granted.

"There on the bed rested my Ruth, her cheeks sunken and wasted with fever and tooking but a shadow of her former self. With a glad smile of welcome she greeted me, although no weeds full from her line. I took her former self. With a glad smile of welcome she greeted me, although no words fell from her lips. I took her small hand in my large tanned ones and sat down beside the bed. The shadows deepened into darkness, but still I sat there holding my darling's hand. Ruth had sunk into sumber. I dared not move for fear of disturbing her. Hour after hour passed until rays of light began to herald the return of day. At last Ruth awoke. A heavenly smile lighted up her features as she whispered to me: "I knew you would come. Harold."

"From that day her recovery was but a matter of time, and one year later we were married, and a happy marriage it has proved for me."

"Apd for me, too," chimed in grandmit, who, unnoticed, had entered the
