They had met after some years of separation and allence. A foreign country was the magnet which drew them to the close intercourse of an ocean voyage, and the days of travel were times of motival pleasure. From present enjoyment and future antispations they drifted into past recollections and unny threads of the old days were taken up again.

The journey ended all too soon, and with promises of continued intercourse the two parted, and the man shortly found himself established in the midst of the rush and confusion of the great city.

the great city.

But in spite of the various interests which ministered to his thoughts and pleasure the heart of the man was lonely. In none of the long-dreamed of wonders and attractions could be lose the recollection of the girl's face or put to flight the constant cry of his decree nature.

or put to flight the constant cry of his deeper nature.

Trusting himself and his quest to the twillight which makes the flood-gates of the heart to open and endows the dumb flow with power to utter the sacred things of the soul the man sought the girl whose will was to make for Joy or sorrow in his life.

As she entered the room where he waited he rose engerly with outstretched hands, and, leading her to a sent, bent upon her a gaze at once gentle and searching.

"Rachie," the old name came from bis lips in the tone of a resumed habit. "Rachie, I want to tell you a story, which perhaps you will finish for me. Years ago a man of impetions, earnest nature, met and loved—yes, leved—a girl much younger than himself. He sought her, gained her interest and endeavored to help her to the best things.

AN INDIAN LEGEND

On the James A. Holmes farm, and near the point where the rippling waters of Langhery creek pour into the great Ohlo, is an indian burief mound of more than ordinary interest, because of the sad and tragic history of the young brave and the fathful indian girl, whose bodies have long since mouldered away beneath the prinning of soil and stone.

Many years after the pale faces had pushed the red near further and further westward, it still was the costom of the remaining members of the ther westward it still was the custom of the remaining members of the straggling bands of Indiana to return each autumn and pay a visit to the tomb of the young chief, Kekoleah, and the Indian girl, Lakatosh, who, when unable to become his bride in life, chose to be his in death rather than suffer separation from him.

About a century and a half ago the wigwams of the Potrawatomies and Delawares were nitched on the paint.

wigwams of the Pottawatomies and Delawares were pitched on the point of land on the south side of Laughery creek, where that stream enters into the Ohio. The season was the most beautiful of all the year-Indian sum-mer. The days were dreams of beauty, and the nights were still more won drously beautiful, lighted by the mel-low, silvery light of the full October moon.

Kekoleah (Swift Foot) was the son and only child of the chief of the Pottawatemies, and from early boyhood he had given premise of becoming a great leader of his people. In using the arrow none could compete with Kekoleah; in spenring fish while they swam about in the deep, blue depths of Laughery, no hand was so unorting as his. In all the tribe there was none so swift of foot as this decing son of the old chieffain. This young brave would chase a deer and capture it without the aid of weapons by following it until it became his prize from sheer exhaustion.

Sausewattama, chief of the Delawars, had only one child—a daughter. Lakalah (Bright Eyes) was besutiful and as graceful as the pilant willows which she wove into baskets. The good feeling between the two tribes had ever been secure, but soon it was to be welled still more firmly by the union of these two children of the ruling chieffains.

As was the custom, a long series of Kekelegh (Swift Foot) was the ing chieftnins.

As was the custom, a long series of As was the custom, a long series of annusements was to be observed dur-ing the month prior to the marriage, the first of which was to be a grand hunt along the shaded banks and wooded bills of that beautiful stream

-Laughery.

The young men were impatient for the hunt to begin, and finally, headed by their flery and impetuous leader, Kekoleah, they started up mud lick toward the point where Dilisboro now stands. On the brow of a big hill, which is now a part of the John Spear farm, a deer was started, and swift in pursuit followed the nimble-footed Kekoleah. The deer, a fine buck, start-Laughery.

soon answered by the walls from the Indian maidens at the camp.

The body of Kekoleah was carried to camp. The grief of the old chief, when he learned that his son, the pride of the Pottawatomies, was a corpse, was terrible. The girl, Lakalo, ab, threw herself across the breast of the lifeless warrior and locking her arms about his neck, refused to be taken away. Thus she remained for hours, when finally she became uncontinuously dim.

The girl raised her tear-dimmed cres and said softly but bravely. "List iten, dear friend, Years ago a girl met a man much older than herself and wiser. He sought and won her by the love and worth he brought to her. To her Joy he tried to share, to bestow upon her the freasures he had gathered by the way.

"But, alast for his blindness, he failed to see that the heart of the girl woman could not live on the treasures of earth alone; it craved the food of heaven, love, and its fullest expression. So she hid within herself and lill she was misundertsool; and thought freeponsive to the highest. There were paths opened to the man and he could do zone else than tread them. And the girl, judged not ready to walk therein, must be told good-by.

"The soul bestowed its treasure on the soul that believed in it, and the giving and the taking, and the taking and the taking, and the taking and giving have made perfect joy and unity.

"Dear friend, need I tell you more?"
A silence rested upon the two. Then the body of her who was the man slowly rose, holding out his hand. The girl placed hers within it, and at the touch the man spole:
