SENATOR QUAY

The careful historian who weighs the nots of men as they affect for good or evil the community or the that it does no damage to the crops nation, and impress themselves on the public mind as incentives to a higher morality or tend to lower the tone and standard of popular a farmer was compelled to build and thought and action, will find in the life of the senator who has just passed away to render his account before the highest judgment seatsomething both to commend and condemn. No human life is free from the latter quality and those who live largely in the public eye and whose every act is closely scanned and whose motives are ever subject to question by his opponents must needs incur harsh judgments. His friends and followers will find in his life much to commend and see virtue where others find only vice. That Senator Quay was great in some qualities of mind his most
