GERALD'S MOTHER.

"You see," explained the young woman in the fashionable brown hat, "the situation was much more difficult because Gerald and I are not actually—that is, nothing has been really said. Still, he and I know."

"Oh, dear me, yes!" broke in her friend, who wore a picture hat with drooping plumes. "I understand just what you mean—you aren't engaged yet, but you're going to be isn't it?"

The young woman in the brown turban cast down her eyes and blushed beautifully. "Well, anyhow, I naturally wanted to be extra nice to my mother. I wanted her to like me and I knew I'd have to make a fight for it. A man's mother always is in a way against whatever girl he picks out—she always knows some other girl who would have filled the bill so much better—and I determined to convince Gerald's mother when I got acquainted with her that I was the one exception to the rule. I was going to overwhelm her on sight with such a combination of beauty, sweetness and charm that she'd love me forever more." She paused.

"Well, did you?" asked the girl in the picture hat.

Her friend sighed.

"Really, I'm afraid not," she went on, "I was helping Mrs. Fernan the night she gave her big card party. Three of us girls wore on the programme to flutter about the tables and see that things were all right at supper time. Fancy my excitement when I found Gerald's mother was among the guests! I knew my time had come to conquer. I thought it would be so lovely to fascinate her before she found out who I was—it would make things easier. Luckily I noticed that her coffee cup was empty."

"I grabbed up the tall silver coffee pot and floated up to her table. I was so nervous that my cheeks were red and my hand shook. I leaped over her shoulder in what I am sure was a graceful attitude."

"May I not give you some more coffee?" I asked in my most cultured accents. It was a thrilling moment—I felt that some subtle instinct told her that her life and mine were to be closely entwined, for she gave a positive jump.

"When she spoke I had the shock of my existence. 'I think not,' she said in the smooth and icy tones you use when you'd like to murder any one; 'I think not—you're already bestowed upon me a great deal more coffee than I have any use for.'"

"And I had! You see, dear, as I leaned over, the coffee pot in my right hand had tilted and sent a stream of hot coffee down the back of Gerald's mother's neck!"

"Goodness!"

"Wasn't it awful! I simply gasped, swallowed hard and hid and hid in dark corners till she left."

"You understand, the worst of it is that now I'm scared to death to think of meeting her and being introduced. Of course, Gerald is crazy for her to know me and he can't understand my sudden timidity about it. He says I'm foolish, for he has told her how nice I am, and of course she'll like me! That's just like a man—and I can't explain to him, especially since he happened to mention that his mother was so indignant because some stupid young woman raised her gown at the Fernans by pouring coffee all over it. There is nothing to do but keep out of her sight and induce Gerald to elope. Why, I'd rather face a den of tigers!"

"The girl in the picture hat grabbed her friend's arm. Her face flamed with dramatic enthusiasm. "What a situation!" she murmured.

"What do you mean?"

"Don't move," said the girl in the picture hat in the pleasant tone a woman uses when she sees tribulation descending upon her dearest friend.

"Here comes Gerald to speak to us—and his mother is with him!"

"The girl in the brown turban sat stonily awaiting her doom.—Chicago News.

Rich, Resonant English. English is put to strange and eloquent uses in the Orient. Here, for instance, is a letter addressed to a native gentleman by a youth seeking the hand of his daughter:

"To Baboo, Paternal father of Miss. Dear Sir, It is with a flattering penmanship that I write to have communication with you about the prospective condition of your amiable offspring. For some remote time to past a secret passion has sprung my bosom internally with loving for your daughter, I have navigated every channel in the magnitude of my extensive jurisdiction to crush another the growing love that is being contracted in my wife's side, but the humid lamp of affection trimmed by Cupid's productive hand still nurtures my love-strengthened heart. Needless would it be for me to sum vitally extemporize the great con agnation that has been generated in my head and heart. Hoping that having debated this proposition to your present mind, you will courteously corroborate in espousing my female progeny to my tender bosom and thereby acquire me into your family circle. Your dutiful Son-in-law,—"Harper's Weekly.

Higher Thoughts. "You look like a regular beer guster. Don't your thoughts ever rise above beer?"

"Yes, sirs; I often think of de 13 cent drinks! But what's de use when a gent ain't got de price?"—Kansas City Journal.

That Throbbing Headache Would quickly leave you, if you used Dr. King's New Life Pills. Thousands of sufferers have proved their matchless merit for sick and nervous headaches. They make pure blood and build up your health. Only 25 cents, money back if not cured. Sold by all druggists.

TRAMPS IN LONDON PARKS.

The "dossers" of the London parks in, in themselves, cause out of twenty, an idler by choice, a wanderer by night, whose day dreams are not loaves to work. Distasteful most things that are not directly associated with food and drink, the "dossers" of the parks supplies ready-made to hand a local substitute for the "damned souls of civilization" among whom Maxim Gorke finds his heroes.

The recumbent figures in the London parks are among the honest fighters who have fallen. Occasionally distress does bring a man down to make his bed by day on the soft grass, but it is seldom so.

The "dossers" are not allowed to remain in the parks all night. A few of them do occasionally elude the keepers and the police, but all that can be found are turned out at closing time. The historian concerned as to it that in St. James's and the Green parks, the police undertake the duty in Hyde Park and Regent's Park. The same law as to sleeping obtains in parks under the control of the County Council. As long as these people conduct themselves properly there is no interference with them. At night the Mall and the Thames embankment provide them with seats, but they return to the parks when the gates are opened.

Occasionally in the early morning keepers have seen "dossers" get a can of water for washing purposes, but as a rule the "dossier" does not regard a wash as a luxury or a necessity. Strange to say, these non-working citizens generally have tobacco to smoke. They frequent restaurants—the outside—for the food that the proprietor gives them instead of throwing it away. That is how the "dossier" lives. He mends his clothes, of course, for as a rule the "dossier" is a bachelor or at least he lives in garcon, and necessity has taught him to use a needle. They occasionally cut each other's hair. The bete noir of a "dossier" is a band playing in the evening.—London Sphere.

There is no agreement among the democrats as to who will be chairman of the National Committee.

Along with the rivalry for the presidential nomination goes the controversy over the selection of the chairman for the campaign.

The successful democratic nominee will have the naming of the national chairman, and this fact will likely enter into the nomination itself. A block of delegates will probably be traded for that important generalship, which further complicates the democratic situation.

The business pulse of the country indicates undisturbed political conditions. Were there any real chances whatever for the national democratic success—success at the polls, since any other success for the democracy is something unknown in history—we would already be having substantial evidences in the business and industrial world of such a catastrophe. On the other hand business continues good and the country is looking forward to continued prosperity.
