A VISIT TO IDLEVIEW.

A DREAM

I was nodding in my old armchair One cold and crispy night I'd been residing of the intilnight san In a novel, by the light Of a student's lamp. A drowsy sleep Stole o'er me ere I knew I was wafted off to a land so strauge They called it "Idleview."

The scene was this; a stage appeared Elevated from the ground About four feet, and rustic seats Were scattered all around; A crimson curtain drawn aside, Moss covered was the floor, f stood leaving, gazing at a sight I never saw before,

Fronting the stage a placid lake Like molten silver spread, So broad and beautiful, and clear As crystal. Overhead A million stars respiendent shone More brilliant than the sun, Such dazzling light was never seen Since the world begun.

Ahead the lake and on each side The mountains towered high, Forming a semi circle round, They seemed to touch the sky. And on the lofty mountains grand From base to highest crest, In richest varied verdue they Were gorgeously drest.

A glistening stream of water flowed From whence I could not tell, But it came rushing down the steen About midway, and fell Into. I thought a capyon deep, For I heard a splash and roar, Like torrents gushing over rocks In one continuous pour.

Nature sublime on every side I saw; but not a voice I heard to glorify the Cause Or with me to rejoice, But as I stood reflecting thus, A new sight met my eyes; A glorious rainhow spread across

The lake and in the skies.

The stars to diamonds seemed to change Although it was noonday, And the mountains, too they higher ross And an Iridescent spray Fell from the sky, then suddenly Vineyards, olive groves, and bowers And greenest fields, sprang up Richly garnished with choice flowers

I thought I smelt a fragrance sweet, Twas wafted through the air, And the sweetest notes of music fell From beaven; for nowhere Else could such entrancing strains Came forth, I closed my eyas, Lest I should lose a single note, But then to my surprise The music ceased; I gave a jerk, My book fell on the floor, Good night-good night to "Idleview" I shall never see you more.
