the humic acid of acid sofis checks its growth of bacteria. This result was obtained by comparing the effects of freah peat mold and peat which had been freed of acid by leaching. The soli of moors produced similar re-sults. The bactericidal properties of the motallic saits sodium chloride, exclum chloride, and copper sulphate, and the carbon compounds ether, ben-fine, carbon term-chloride and tolool were also studied. Sodium chloride were also studied. Sodium chloride added to urine in the proportion of 2 per cent, had no effect on the bacteria, but their growth was arrested by 1-6 per cent. of copper sulphats and by a mere trace of calcium chloride, while mere trace of calcium chloride pro-duced complete sterilization. Of the carbon compounds tested toluol alone exhibited antiseptic properties, while ether stimulated the growth of bacteris. The effect of metailic saits and peat moid in conjunction was also in-vestigated. The addition of peat moid vestigated the addition of peak mone to a soil containing codum chloride diminished the growth of bacteria. The germiedal action of calcium chloride is accelerated by the addition of peat mold, because the humic acid
