GREAT. The ancient Persians, five centuries before Christ, were distinguished for their temperance, bravery, and virtuous simplicity of manners. They bestowed the utmost attention upon the education of their children. Public schools were established, and thus the means of elsmentary instruction were widely diffused over the whole empire; they therefore soon rose from obscurity to a distinguish. ed rank in the scale of nations. At five years of age their children were committed to the care of the "Magi" for the improvement of their minds and morals. Among the children thus educated, "Cyrus the Great," son of "Cambyses" King of Persia, was indefatigably enappointed by the Governor to view the gaged in the acquisition of every valuhams in the Sasquehampa river, for the able quality requisite to make a wise purpose of devising some plan or meas- and useful Sovereign. He with a profuse hand loaded him with presents. Wine was soon after introduced by the King being absent, Cyrus offered to perform his duties. He took the cup and presented it to his grandfather, who, laughingly, observed that the young prince had forgotten one thing. "What have I forgotten?" asked Cyres. "To taste the wine before you handed it to me and Street, New York. your mother," (a custom which prevailed on similar occasions in all the orient. al dominions) The Prince fearlessly and characteristically replied, "I did not forget that but I did not choose to swallow poison." "Poison!" exclaimed the King. "Yes, there must be poison in the cup, for they who drink of it sometimes grow giddy and sick and fall down." "Then do you never drink in your country ?" inquired Astyges. "Yes, we only drink to satisfy thirst, and then one unpaid on the first of August, will a little water suffices." Cyrus carried those inestimable virtues which he was early taught with him to the throne. Although Persia was originally small in extent and almost wholly unknown, under his ordinance it became one of the most powerful nations on earth.
