The first question, with an honest and prudent man, is, is the debt just? If this is doubtful, the next inquiry whether circumstances are such as to hold him bound. If so, he bears and pays; and is even glad if a year's rest will discommodate him.

But if these bonds must all be paid, and if there was an imposition in the origin of some of them, and if the proceeds were not put to the use of the citizens still are not without a portion of consolation. The Railroads have increased the value of property from fifty to five hundred per cent.

It is to be hoped, that our economical officials, and our wise and people-loving politicians, will press the matter of obligation to a speedy settlement; and if the burden is really to be borne, let us bend ourselves to it, making a virtue of necessity; and consoling ourselves with the fact that we are not alone.
