PP&L studies itself

PP&L has "made a series of capacity and fuel supply decisions that have provided power to its customers reliably, and compared to other utilities, at a very low cost, while maintaining a good environmental record," a new study says.

The study, done for PP&L by McKinsey and Co., a management consultant firm, cost $500,000 and took 6 months to complete.

Increased efficiency for PP&L depends partly on government action, the management firm concluded. Cutbacks in the number of line crews and vehicles and, inventory reductions and changes in accounting procedure, which the study recommends, require state Public Utility Commission Approval.

Most of the 84 jobs which would be lost can be vacated by "attrition" rather than lay-offs. The price of power is not likely to go down as a result of the proposed changes.

Other proposals include: —Tightening management control. Hiring 10 to 15 auditors for increased internal audits.

—Strengthening planning in critical resource areas. Tightening fuel purchase planning and policies.
