

Scientists predict more floods on Susquehanna

The following article appeared in Pennsylvania Geology Magazine.

IS ANYBODY LISTENING?

Several years prior to the disastrous Alaskan earthquake of 1964 the U.S. Geological Survey published a report which pointed out that the ground conditions of the Anchorage area could result in serious earthquake damage. Despite the warning, development continued; no zoning or building restrictions were imposed. The earthquake came and disaster resulted.

For years, the location and implication of the active San Andreas fault of California has been known and publicized by geologists. Yet even as scientists and the public engaged in speculation as to when the "big quake" will hit California, housing developments, schools, and various other structures are being built astride or in close proximity to the fault zone.

Coming closer to home, geologists and hydrologists have been pointing up some of Pennsylvania's geologic problems. In central and eastern Pennsylvania, to supplement the message of Agnes and Eloise, hydrologists have issued flood-prone area maps and are stressing the point that so-called 10 year floods can occur even two years apart, or less.

The geologists, the hydrologists, and the other earth scientists have a message. Is anybody listening?

Oliver LaGrone's art on display

The Community Gallery, behind the Central Market in Lancaster, will be showing the works of Oliver LaGrone from January 13 to January 30. LaGrone will be exhibiting realistic sculptures of black personages in wood, bronze, and brass.

The Gallery is open to the public from 9 to 4 on Tuesdays and Fridays, and noon to 4 on other days. There is no admission charge.

The Community Gallery, which is supported by private and public funding, presents the best available art in an ongoing series of exhibits.

Mrs. Henry Libhart of Marietta, is director of the Gallery.
