

Mrs. Godfrey Cambridge moves to Marietta

The widow of world-famous comic and actor Godfrey Cambridge moved to Marietta last week.

Audrey Cambridge spotted a home she liked while driving through the river borough a while back. Last week, she and her family moved in the furniture and began redecorating.

"I like the environment here," she told our reporter. "I'm sure I'm among friends."

Audrey Cambridge's favorite topic of conversation is her late husband. There was a side to the great comedian's character that many of his fans don't know about, we learned from his widow.

He was a dedicated enemy of social evils.

Mr. Cambridge sacrificed several years of his career to fighting heroin addiction.

Godfrey and his wife researched, planned, and photographed a film called "Dead Is Dead" about addiction and treatment.

They also spent a lot of volunteer time at the Phoenix House in New York, a shelter for runaways and abandoned children. Cambridge won the award for the best film relating to drugs in 1974. He also won the Pennsylvania Detective Humanitarian Award twice.

Godfrey Cambridge used to keep his family amused (and his skills sharp) by adopting a comic personality as soon as he woke up in the morning. He had 95 dialects and personalities in his repertoire, so the family got to see some original material at every free breakfast performance.

Audrey describes herself as a "realist," but adds that it is sometimes hard to keep a realistic attitude toward life after losing someone you love.

She says, "To not make decisions for a year is the wrong thing to do. One should proceed with the life ahead and be thankful for the time you had together."
