

Experimental Fish farm to be built near here on river

Kraft, Inc., PA Power & Light Company, and the Franklin Institute plan an experimental project to study fish farming in the warm-water outflow of a utility plant.

The research study will take place at Brunner Island Steam Electric Station on the Susquehanna River, about 12 miles south of Harrisburg. Kraft is leasing a site from PP&L, immediately adjacent to the coal-fueled power plant that uses river water in its operation. It discharges warm river water, which will be diverted through the planned production area that will be used to grow fish.

"This project has three main benefits," according to Dr. Jerry E. Proctor, project manager. "First, because fish are the most efficient converters of feed into animal protein, we will be trying to produce an optimum supply of a high quality food for people at the lowest possible cost."

"Second, we will be utilizing the waste energy of the power plant—the warm-water discharge—for productive purposes."

"And, third," he said, "we will be recycling—in the form of feed for the fish—some of the by-products from present food operations. These by-products may include materials such as whey, whey products and cheese rind."
