

Marietta may be 'Historic District'

—no threat to owners' rights

—tax status will change —in about six months

Several weeks ago some residents of Marietta got letters from the Department of the Interior in Washington, advising them that their homes were being considered for an "Historic District." If you got one of these letters, or even if you didn't, you might be wondering what it's all about.

First, and perhaps least important, it means that the designated portion of Marietta will be listed in the National Register, a book published by the government which lists all the historic places deemed worthy by the Dept. of the Interior.

A more profound effect is that no Federal money could ever be used to help destroy an historic property within the district. This was confirmed by Bill Watson, of the Office of Historic Preservation in Harrisburg.

"This will protect Marietta from Federal and State agencies," he said.

Next Friday and Saturday there will be free blood pressure testing at the Farmers First Bank in Marietta, from 6 to 8 p.m. Everyone who goes will receive a free wallet card to keep track of his or her pressure.

The tests will be administered by Junior Aides. Junior Aides are 16 to 18-year-olds who are interested in becoming ambulance personnel. and worked in Marietta and Lancaster during his lifetime. Paintings which have been attributed to him prove he was a highly proficient painter. The Lancaster Historical Society displays three Armstrong portraits.

My purpose in writing is to inquire of your readers, whether any of them might be present-day owners of Armstrong paintings. Their assistance in locating paintings may provide a valuable contribution toward a possible publication of the collected works of Arthur Armstrong.

Anyone volunteering information may write to me at The William Penn Memorial Museum, Box 1026, Harrisburg, PA 17120.

New development in Marietta

Taken from a blueprint, the above map shows the location of the new development which is to be built in Marietta. The plans call for 25 apartments and 25 townhouses; total acreage is 2.521. The development will be known as "Riverview Park."

The townhouses will each have two bedrooms, as will ten of the apartments. The other fifteen apartments will have one bedroom. There will be 87 parking places.

Council approved the plans last August 9th. Trees will be left in place, and areas have been set aside for recreation and picnicing.

Letter
