a $300 system might be just as good as a $1000 system. You usually can't get specifications about consumer equipment, and most people wouldn't understand them anyway. The best approach is to listen to the system, and pick the one that sounds best to you."

He explains that people's ears differ in their acoustic qualities, and thus a system should be bought on the basis of your ears, not the salesman's.

He notes that most specifications for consumer audio gear are misleading. For an example, frequency response might be given as "40 to 20,000 cycles per second," which is a good range. The trick is that the figure is meaningless unless you know how the cut-off points were defined. The response at 40 cycles might be a tenth of that in the midrange, but that will be the cutoff point if the person who wrote the specs decided to put it there.

Many amplifiers and receivers are loaded with knobs, dials, and gauges to the point where one needs an instruction book to use them. David expressed the opinion that these are unnecessary, and in fact encourage the user to distort his music to the point where the artist (and the recording engineer) would scream should they hear it. "Of course, if you're into playing with knobs, that's your choice," David says.
