Rough night in Mount Joy for Santa

Santa had a rough night in Mount Joy last week. He dropped in (on the roof of the antiques building where there was room to park his sleigh) to interview local kids on the subject of Christmas presents, and promptly ran into trouble.

His famous finger (the one he puts to the side of his nose when he wants to levitate up a chimney) was afflicted with frostbite — and he had to be rescued by the fire department before he could descend to street level.

Mrs. Santa, who had managed to land on the street, was very nervous until our brave firefighters brought her husband safely back to earth.

"It's colder here than it is at the North Pole," Santa grumbled. But, when he saw the waiting crowd of children, both his finger and his spirits thawed, and he began shouting, "Ho, ho, ho," to everyone in sight.
