Editorial

—Should CPR be taught at DHS?

Last Sunday's Parade magazine reported that the editors of that publication had gotten a big response to their proposal for mandatory CPR courses in high schools. They published letters favoring the suggestion from educators, doctors, and others.

[In case you still don't know, CPR is a combination of mouth-to-mouth resuscitation and external cardiac massage. It can maintain heart and lung action for a victim of heart attack, drowning, electric shock, or other deadly conditions, and is one of the most effective life-saving techniques the layman can learn.]

We think the people at Parade magazine have the right idea. Our high school offers driver training to help save lives; it's possible that CPR training could save even more.

An objection will be raised to this idea: Its cost—many taxpayers already feel overburdened. The chances are, though, that every Donegal High School student could be trained in CPR for a cost of $2.05 each. That's how much the course costs people who take it on their own; they buy a booklet for that much money, and the instruction itself is free, donated by Red Cross volunteers. The schools would have little trouble finding volunteers to teach CPR through the Red Cross.

If Red Cross CPR teachers were not available for some reason, most likely some of the health and physical education teachers would be willing to take the CPR instruction course, so they could teach CPR as part of their regular classes.

The Susquehanna Times would appreciate letters, to be published in this paper, from people in the community who agree or disagree with our proposal. We will try to publish all letters sent us, space permitting.

We suggest, to those of our readers who have a typewriter and carbon paper, that one copy be sent to us for publication, and one to the Donegal School District.
