Home ownership

by Doris Thomas
Extension Home Economist

One investment which many people have that provides a hedge against inflation is real estate. If you own your own home, you already have a measure of protection against inflation. In periods of inflation, rents usually increase along with all other costs, whereas the size of your mortgage payments will remain the same.

Of course, owning your own home might prove unprofitable; in a period of deflation, rents would normally go down, as would salaries, but your mortgage payments wouldn't.

There are other risks involved. For example, your neighborhood might become rundown or less desirable for some other reason so that, if you should decide to sell your house, you might have to take less than you paid for it.

But these risks do not occur in large numbers and home ownership is generally a good hedge against inflation.

Investing in real estate other than your own home is another way of hedging against inflation, but it involves a fair amount of capital in the beginning. It also demands a great deal of knowledge, attention and skill.
