

The first step in the construction of the new fire station—the destruction of the old Catholic church on New Haven Street—is shown above. The wall, roof, and the opposite wall came down with a crash and a cloud of dense dust as Art Mellinger, the man on the bulldozer, pulled it down with the cable laced about the 'dozer's bucket.

The end walls of the church were left standing by Art's art. "We've found one hornet's nest and 9 bats," Mr. Mellinger told us as he watched a now-homeless bat wing up to the space where its home had been seconds before. As the president of U.S. Wrecking Co., Art makes many bats homeless. "This went pretty well," he mused. "Pulling down a building is a tricky business." The instant the wall had come over [it had taken some rocking of the bulldozer to get enough force] Art jumped from his seat and ran around the building to reassure himself that the other wall had fallen into the church, not back against the neighboring house. Then, as the dust settled, he walked over what had been the wall and roof and looked over his handiwork.
