DHS students get inside story on local jobs

Some Donegal High students are getting in-depth job counseling this month. They're interviewing people who work in local businesses.

Members of the clerical office practice class developed a questionnaire and then got an individual, who is working in a field the student might want to enter, to fill it out and answer questions about his or her job.

Most of the questions were routine, others involved confidential information. The students will discuss their interviews together, leaving the confidential information out.

Some of the questions included: title of the position, major duties, needed training, closeness of supervision, what is good and bad about the job, and working conditions. Some confidential questions that were suggested to the students were: how the people liked their bosses and co-workers, how much money the job pays, and what personal satisfactions the job provides.

Mrs. Houseal, the class teacher, handed out survey sheets with lists of suggested questions and guidelines. The importance of courtesy and confidentiality was stressed.

Each student will fill out answers on the sheet and deliver an oral report to the rest of the class.
