that a light should be there, they will also set the specifications, whereupon the township can hire an engineer to design the lights. Then PennDOT will approve the design.

The lights will have to overhang the road, and Richard Forry is hoping that they can get away with wooden poles, which only cost about $1000 each. PennDOT may want metal poles, which cost about twice that. If they want four overhanging lights with metal poles, that's $8000. Two sets of lights each way—overhead and on the side of the road—is a possibility, which could lead to a total of 2 sets times 3 lights times four directions for a grand total of 24 bulbs. This is assuming that no directional arrow lights are required; that could make 4 bulbs times 2 sets times 4 directions for 32 bulbs all together.

When all the plans are drawn and approved, the problem of paying for the lights will come up. As the reader may have gathered, setting up a traffic light can cost. The one in question is expected to come in at about $35,000.

The higher governments, having allowed the light, will be asked for money by Mr. Forry. So far, he has been in touch with three agencies—the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, the Redevelopment Authority, and the County Commissioners. The National people probably would pay for the light if it were sited in a city, but they are less likely to help erect one in a rural location; The Redevelopment Authority is doubtful; and the Commissioners' office hasn't even answered Richard's letters.

Of course, big government isn't the only place to get money. Occasionally a business, or businesses, will pay part of the cost, if they stand to benefit by the light. As a last resort, the township could pay out of its own pocket—but if it came to this, the light might not go up. $35,000 is a lot of money for a township to come up with.

So far, Richard Forry has spent a couple of days' work on this light, and another that he hopes to get at another busy intersection. "I've written so many letters, I can't keep track," he says. He tells of frustrations involved in the job, and wonders at times what PennDOT is up to. "They're whimsical," he says. "Dealing with them is like dealing with the wind—they keep changing direction."

In a related case, Forry tells of a problem with getting a speed limit changed. PennDOT says that a traffic study must be done before you apply for a reduced speed limit. However, the guidelines for making a traffic study aren't in print. A call to the government bookstore revealed that the guidelines won't be available in definite form until next year.

"It's a long road, and it's not easy," says Richard Forry.

have built in their off hours.

Tuesday night is Parent-Teacher Night at Beahm Junior High. Starting at 7:00 PM, there will be refreshments in the cafeteria, and members of the School Board will be on hand—right next to the refreshments—if anyone wants to talk with them. A movie, "A Day in The Life of Bonnie Consollo," will be shown. Parent-Teacher Night will run until 9:00 PM.

This is a good time to meet your children's teachers and discuss any problems or ideas. It's also an opportunity to meet the School Board members.

Incidentally, the regular School Board meeting will be on Thursday evening at Washington School in Mount Joy. The public, as always, is invited.
