Don't switch gasolines

The EPA asks you not to use leaded gas if your car says "unleaded only" above the gas intake. They have found that about 10% of recent-model car owners are switching gas.

People switch because they think they will save money, improve mileage, or reduce engine "knocking"—but all three ideas are false. And regular gas causes pollution.

Here are the facts: unleaded gas gives .2 miles per gallon over regular; regular gas erodes plugs, carburetors, and exhaust pipes, which adds 7 cents a gallon in upkeep costs over the life of your car (while buying leaded gas saves only about 5 cents a gallon); and unleaded gas is available with just as high an octane rating as leaded gas—so if your car knocks, try a different brand of unleaded, don't switch.

Some more facts: regular or premium gasolines spew out more pollution—carbon monoxide, hydrocarbons, and of course lead—from your car than unleaded. These substances cause smog, lung troubles, sleepiness, heart attacks, eye irritation, nerve damage, anemia, blurred vision, fatigue, etc., etc.

Even if you don't care about the environment and your neighbors' health, don't switch. Switching in the long run hurts your pocketbook as well as everybody's health.
