Geiger counters were missing during TMI, but others were in reserve

The local Civil Defense organizations had no Geiger counters during the TMI incident, it has been learned. All the counters were removed about a year ago.

The instruments had been kept in fallout shelters as part of the standard equipment, but were removed on the orders of the state government. They are owned by the government. The reason was according to Paul Leas, County Civil Defense director, "pilferage." Too many had been snatched.

Despite the lack of Geiger counters for Civil Defense, local fire companies had them, according to Leas.

The County Civil Defense lent dosimeters to all local police departments during the accident, Leas added.

Marietta Civil Defense director Bill Breckline told the Times that he has his own personal Geiger Counter, a "really perfect unit." He also has 8 certified users.

Paul Leas said that, if a serious radiation release had occurred, all Civil Defense units would have gotten Geiger counters quickly. (Geiger counters are useless in detecting very low-level radiation such as was in this area during the accident.)
