Cute Saying

A local family went to New York recently, mostly because they wanted their children to see the mummies.

The parents were pleased when their four-year-old son took a deep interest in the Egyptian exhibit at the Metropolitan Museum of Art. He was particularly interested in looking at the ancient mummies.

Then, after he had satisfied his curiosity about the mummies, he said, "Now let's see the dad-dies."

PP&L's nuclear plant has simulator control

PP&L's new Berwick nuclear plant has two control rooms. One will operate the plant; the other is a dummy, for training operators.

Fake controls, or "simulators," have been used for years to train airplane pilots. Now PP&L is applying that idea to nuclear plants.

The fake control room, which cost $10 million, is just like the real control room, dial for dial, except that it's hooked to a big computer instead of a power plant. Operators in training will have to deal with any of the computer's 1500 malfunction simulations, as well as studying math, physics, and the properties of super-heated water—all subjects that will make it easier for operators to deal with an unusual problem.

PP&L president Robert Campbell said, "We want them to be able to solve real, unanticipated problems if they arise when the plant is on-line." While the training center is now open, the Berwick plant itself is not yet on-line.

The recently-dedicated Berwick training center is one of four operated by PP&L. PP&L's present on-line plants are all use conventional fuels.

The simulator at the Susquehanna Training Center is a duplicate of that portion of the Susquehanna nuclear power plant's control room which controls Unit 1 and systems common to both of the plant's nuclear reactors.
