Local Architecture

Recently the Historic Preservation Trust of Lancaster County published a handbook, Lancaster Architecture 1719-1927: A Guide to Publicly Accessible Buildings in Lancaster County. This book illustrates and describes six major styles of American architecture as they developed in Lancaster County Buildings.

The book was researched and written by John J. Snyder, Jr., architectural historian, Historic Preservation Trust of Lancaster County, with photographs by John P. Herr. The book is edited by Roberta Strickler.

The book includes several photographs of local interest. They are included below.

The Old Town Hall in Marietta was built in 1847. It illustrates the continuity of late Federal taste into the early Victorian period.

The Wright's Ferry Mansion at Second and Cherry Streets, Columbia, is one of the best examples of a traditional English rural type house. The structure is long and narrow, with an interior depth of only one room, a traditional English plan which dates to medieval times. The Wright's Ferry Mansion also has features which indicate Germanic influence. Included are the long, wooden shingles attached with only one nail, the squirrel tail oven at the gable end, and the encircling pent eave, [a roof-like projection between the first and second stories.]

The Donegal Presbyterian Church is also a fine example of traditional English architecture. Built about 1740, the gambrel roof and the basic form of the building show Irish influences.

The Mansion at Donegal Mills Plantation has the largest surviving Greek Revival portico in the County. The columns were added during an 1830 renovation of the eighteenth century house.
