a corollary generalization is that American directors have had a much poorer track tecord with young children. Director Robert Benton, who readily acknowledges the invaluable assistance provided by Dustin Hoffman, captures a brilliant performance from seven-vear-old Justin Henry. This young child is captivating. When he sheds a tear, unlike that tear machine, Ricky Schroeder, in The Champ, your heart aches for the torments he is going through. At the risk of sounding hyperbolic, it is the finest performance I can recall by a young actor in a good number of years.

Benton's direction is adequate; excluding his handling of actors and his flawless case selection (which includes Howard Duff who also appeared in Benton's The Late Show and Jobeth Williams. The latter is delightful, especially in one short scene where she is stark naked and bumps into Hoffman's son on her way to the bathroom. While trying to hide her vital parts, she is egaged in a discussion of fried chicken by the boy.) Director Benton does not rush things. He allows enough time to linger over small touches that are enjoyable unto themselves and go a long way toward providing a texture that gives variety and flavor to people's lives. This is expecially true during the quiet moments.

The films weakest part is the basic plot. Robert Benton takes his story from Avery Corman's novel, which I have not read. If it had not been for the brilliant casting and acting, the film would have been a mediocre drama about modern day marriage. Kramer vs. Kramer's plot is a trifle calculated for my taste; one can almost hear the contrived story devices clicking into place. Listen for: How can the wife suddenly demand a salary of $31,000?; Why does the husband have to lose his job immediately prior to Christmas?; Why does the husband have to be such a total klutz around the kitchen?-he can't even crack an egg; why does his secretary have to so unthinking in her efficiency? she follows him into an important meeting carrying a bag of his groceries. If there is a glaring flaw in the movie, it is the concluding scene which is psychologically inconsistent and dramatically anticlimactic. Benton should have either eliminated it or padded the scene in an attempt to make it seem less abrupt and more consistent with the wife's growth.

One question in passing: Would the film have received such critical acclaim (I exclude the acting) had it focused on the working housewife? How much of the film's success is because it is the husband fighting for custody of his son rather than the reverse?

Benton's photographer is the extremely gifted Nestor Almendros. His work in Kramer is purely pedestrian. It comes nowhere near his previous cinematography in, for example, Truffant's The Story of Adele H (his endless array of dark brown shadings was staggering), Terrence Malick's Days of Heaven, and Eric Rohmer's piddling Chairs Knee.

Kramer vs. Kramer is playing at the Pacific 3 Theater in Lancaster.

Scavenger Hunt

When multi-millionaire board game tycoon Milton Parker dies he forces his relatives and faithful employees to engage in a reallife scavenger hunt to collect his fortune. The prize is $200 million, and it's winner-take-all. Of course, the items to be collected are extremely off-beat (e.g., an ostrich from the San Diego Zoo).

Scavenger Hunt is directed by Michael (Car Wash) Schultz. The movie contains an endless assortment of unfunny physical skits. For example, two people lugging a huge safe down serveral flights of stairs because the elevator isn't operating (until, that is, they reach the bottom floor) or a group of frantic people "drowning" in a tidal wave of (you guessed it) soap suds.

Going in Style

If you enjoy seeing three old timers sitting on a park bench feeding pigeons and watching instant coffee dissolve, you'll be in ecstasy over Going in Style. Otherwise, the film—staring George Burns, Art Carney, and Lee Strasberg—is designed for sleeping. Its pace is geared toward a car backing into the East River Drive at rush hour.

Joe (Burns), Al (Carney), and Willie (Strasberg) are marking time. They live to cash their social security checks. While waiting in a bank line one day Joe hits upon a foolproof plan—

"Let's stick up a bank". Why is it foolproof? Simple. As Joe tells his disbelieving buddies, "What's there to lose?" If they don't get caught they'll have the loot, if they do get caught they'll simply serve their sentences—free room and board—and collect three years worth of Social Security checks when they get out.

Martin Brest's maiden directorial venture has about as much life in it as the inane plot. The picture has even fewer laughs.

Going In Style is currently playing at the Wonderland 3 Theater in Lancaster.
