

Jill Shupp, probation officer, holds a mock interview with Donegal High School student Charles Groff.

Sociology students at DHS listen to probation officer

Sociology students at Donegal High School had a chance to question a juvenile patrol officer last week.

Jill Shupp, a Donegal graduate, spoke to about 100 students. Ms. Shupp has been a patrol officer for Lancaster County for the past three years.

A graduate of Millersville State College, she had a dual major in psychology and social work. "I always knew I wanted to be a parole officer. My education was part of my preparation."

Ms. Shupp finds her job both challenging and rewarding. "It is really frustrating the way some kids respond. They just don't want your help."

After only one week on the job, Ms. Shupp had an experience that would have driven many from the field. "I had as a client an 8-year-old Amish girl accused of murder! That was a rough one." Fortunately things went smoothly in that case after a medical discovery proved that the little girl could not control her actions. Jill remarks that she has had no case to compare with that one in the three years since.

In addition to explaining legal rights and proceedings to the students, Ms. Shupp conducted a mock interview with a student where she took the role of the juvenile and the student took the role of parole officer. The interview demonstrated the difficult situations encountered by the parole officer.
