If set out later than this period, they should be covered with a little long stable manure or leaves to prevent injury from deep freezing. Rhubarb and asparagus plants, whether young or old, begin to develop buds which form the stalks just as soon as the weather turns mild in the Spring. As soon as the buds develop there is a corresponding growth of rootlets. When the plants are set out in the Fall the earth is settled about the plants and root and top growth starts early in the Spring, frequently as early as the last week in March. Fall-planted roots not only make an early growth but they become so firmly established in their new home as to better able to resist the dry, hot day of the following summer.
