CLUB WHERE SILENCE REIGNS

London (Eng.) Institute Should Have a Quieting Effect on Tired Nerves.

A club in which the human voice is rarely heard has just been opened in London. As the name, the National Deaf club, would imply, the members are deaf or are deaf mutes. Conversation is carried on by oral or manual signs. Even the solitary waiter-chief never offers an audible comment on the weather. There are no bells in the club, the assumption being that if they were to ring nobody would notice them. Under the door-plate a button resembling an electric bell-push certainly does exist, but when pressed there is no responsive purring in the club two floors above the level of the street; instead a red light is automatically switched on, and the members know that someone is at the door. Similarly when the services of the waiter are invoked, it is a red light in his sanctum which is the agent. Six years ago the National Deaf club was started in a cafe. So rapid has been its growth that recently larger premises were acquired, and these were opened by the president, whose deafness has not prevented him from conducting a very successful business. Another remarkable member, who is a deaf mute, is responsible for the railway system of Smyrna, and commands an army of workmen of various nationalities by means of signs. The club numbers 120 men and 50 women, and included in its appointments is a billiard table where disappointed exclamations are never heard.

Taking Their Time. "It seems to me," said the man who looked at his watch frequently, "that these pay-as-you-enter cars stop longer to let off passengers than the old-fashioned cars do. Am I right?" "You are," said the conductor, "and the reason is that people who wish to leave press the button and then sit still till the car stops, and we have to wait till they walk the whole length of the car. Under the old system they couldn't be so independent. Before they could catch the eye of the conductor most passengers not only had to stand up, but to walk half way back to the door, so by the time the car stopped they were right there ready to step off. The new way may be more convenient, but it eats up time."

Wise Girl. Their boat was drifting idly, the sun shone above, soothing the soul, and the sea was serene; while she—she was sitting snugly not on the same side of the ship. Then he proposed. From the opposite side of the craft she gazed at him calmly. Then she spoke: "As a matter of common sense, realizing that we are in this boat, on water which is more than fifty feet deep, and that if you were to act as you should act if I accepted you we would be capsized, I will decline your proposal at the moment; but, George, row as fast as you can to the shore, and ask me again."
