Joseph H. Tyson, of Columbia, Suffering From Blood Poison

Joseph H. Tyson, who tenants the Rosenthal farm near Columbia, is in a serious condition at his home suffering from blood poisoning sustained by running a locust briar in his hand. Last Thursday Tyson started to clean the fences about the farm, and in doing so came in contact with locust trees which grow along them. In trying to clear away some dirt beneath a tree a sharp thorn inflicted an ugly would in his hand. He paid little attention to it until his hand began to swell and Dr. Berntheisel of Columbia, was called The physician ound that the wound had become and engraved.
