What Do You Know?
Do you know that an editor or a reporter for a newspaper can in his rounds stop and ask a hundred persons "what is the news?" and ninety out of the hundred will reply "nothing special" and yet 50 out of that number know something that, if not found in the next paper will astonish them greatly and disappoint them more, and probably make them madder than hornets.

Was McClellan a Traitor?
In Harper's Magazine there are printed for the first time extracts from John Hay's diary, written when he was Lincoln's secretary. Writing in 1864, he recounts a story told him by Lincoln which reveals McClellan in a new light.

"On September 25, 1864, Hay records that a letter had just come from Nicolay, who was in New York, stating that Thurlow Weed, the dominant Republican leader in New York State, with whom Nicolay was to confer, had gone to Canada. When Hay showed the President the letter he said: 'I think I know where Mr. Weed has gone. I think he has gone to Vermont, not Canada. I will tell you what he is trying to do. I have not as yet told anybody.'

"And then Lincoln proceeded to unfold the following story of a remarkable intrigue: Some time ago the Governor of Vermont came to me on 'business of importance,' he said. I fixed an hour and he came. His name is Smith. He is, though you would not think it, a cousin of Baldy Smith. Baldy is large, dark sort of man. This is the story he told me, giving General Baldy Smith as his authority:

"When Gen. McClellan was here at Washington (in 1862) E. Smith was very intimate with him. They had been together at West Point and friends. McClellan had asked for promotion for Baldy from the President and got it. They were close and confidential friends. When they went down to the Peninsula their same intimate relations continued. The General talking freely with Smith about all his plans and prospects, until one day Fernando Wood and one other (Democratic) politician from New York appeared in camp and passed some days with McClellan.

"From the day this took place Smith saw, or thought he saw, that McClellan was treating him with unusual coolness and reserve. After a little while he mentioned this to McClellan, who, after some talk, told Baldy he had something to show him. He told him that these people who had recently visited him had been urging him to stand as an opposition candidate for President; that he had thought the thing over and had concluded to accept their proposition, and had written them a letter (which he had not yet sent) giving his idea of the proper way of conducting the war, so as to conciliate and impress the people of the South with the idea that our armies were intended merely to execute the laws and protect their property, etc., and pledging himself to conduct the war in that inefficient, conciliatory way.

"This letter he read to Baldy, who, after the reading, was finished, said earnestly: 'General, do you not see that looks like treason, and that it will ruin you and all of us?' After some further talk the General destroyed the letter in Baldy's presence, and thanked him heartily for his frank and friendly counsel. After this he was again taken into the intimate confidence of McClellan.

"Immediately after the battle of Antietam, Wood and his familiar came again and saw the General and again Baldy saw an immediate estrangement on the part of McClellan. He seemed to be anxious to get his intimate friends out of the way and to add opportunities of private conversation with them. Baldy he particularly kept employed on reconnaissance and such work. One night Smith was returning from some duty he had been performing, and seeing a light in McClellan's tent, he went in to report. He reported and was about to withdraw when the General requested him to remain. After every one was gone he told him those men had been there again and had renewed their proposition about the Presidency; that this time he had agreed to their proposition and had written them a letter acceding to their terms and pledging himself to carry on the war in the sense already indicated. This letter he read then and there to Baldy Smith.

"Immediately thereafter E. Smith applied to be transferred from that army. At very nearly the same time other prominent men asked the same—Franklin, Burnside and others. 'Now that letter must be in the possession of F. Wood, and it will not be impossible to get it. Mr. Weed has, I think, gone to Vermont to see the Smiths about it.' 'Hay continues: 'I was very much surprised at the story and expressed my surprise. I said I had always thought that McClellan's fault was a constitutional weakness and timidity, which prevented him from active and timely exertion, instead of any such deep-laid scheme of treachery and ambition.

"The President replied: 'After the battle of Antietam I went up to the field to try to get him to move, and came back thinking he would move at once. But when I got home he began to argue why he ought not to move. I peremptorily ordered him to advance. It was nineteen days before he put a man over the river. It was nine days longer before he got his army across, and then he stopped again, delaying on little pretenses of wanting this and that. I began to fear he was playing false—that he did not want to hurt the enemy. I saw how he could intercept the enemy on the way to Richmond. I determined to make that the test. If he let them get away I would remove him. He did so, and I relieved him.'

Quite a Philosopher
"Don't you wish you had sense enough to make a million?" "No. I wish I had sense enough to make a quarter of a million and stop with that and enjoy it."

Don't be afraid to let the newspaper man know it.

ERNEST MALTRAVERS

Copyright, 1913, by The Press Publishing Co.

Ernest Maltravers, a rich man's son, stopped for the night at a lovely hut on the moors. The hovel had but two occupants, Richard Darvil and his pretty daughter, Alice. Darvil snarlingly bade Ernest begone. But, finding the youth carried a large sum of money and a costly watch, the man ended by begging him to spend the night there.

Alice found a moment to whisper to Ernest that her father was a thief and a murderer, and to warn the guest to go away at once. Ernest fled, barely in time, telling Alice to join him next day at a distant inn. She obeyed, for her father, furious at her share in Ernest's escape, had cast her off.

Ernest was not especially interested in Alice. He merely wished to be of use to her because she had saved his life. He found her clever, good, charming, but absolutely and utterly ignorant. She could not read or write. She had never heard of God. She was as untaught as the child of three.

To avert scandal Ernest introduced Alice in the neighborhood as his wife. "Mrs. Butler," rented a cottage for her and put her in the care of a wise old village woman. He had her educated by the best local teachers and, being himself a fine musician, taught her to sing and play.

She learned swiftly. From an illiterate country girl she blossomed forth into an accomplished and beautiful woman. Ernest, in spite of himself, found he was reciprocating the deep love she had always felt for him.

Just then he was called away by the death of his father. When he returned three weeks later to marry Alice, he found the cottage looted by robbers, and deserted. There was no trace of the girl. Nor could all his inquiries and offers of money secure for him a single clue as to her whereabouts. Half crazy with grief Ernest went to London; there to take up a new life and try to forget.

Darvil had robbed the cottage and had carried Alice away to Ireland. When at last she was able to escape and to make her way back to the village where she had long since become Ernest Maltravers had long since gone away. Nor (since she knew him only as "Butler") could she trace him.

After nearly starving she managed to pick up a living as a music teacher. Then she met an elderly banker named Templeton who, knowing her whole story, asked her to be his wife. She refused. For there was but one love in all her life and she had never lost hope of meeting Ernest again.

Meantime Ernest Maltravers was rising fast in the world of literature and politics. Stanley Ferrers, a black guardly fortune hunter, who had strong influence over him was gradually making him a callous man of the world. He had half forgotten Alice. Yet, in the next few years each of the former lovers saw the other—once.

Alice, passing a country inn, caught a glimpse of Ernest. He was talking to another woman, and with a seeming ardor that gave the heartbroken on-looker a false idea of the situation. Believing Ernest had learned to love someone else Alice consented to marry Mr. Templeton.

In a London church one Sunday Ernest saw Alice and Templeton sitting side by side. After service he hurried toward them. But the crowd was so thick he lost sight of them.

And so life dragged on for years. Ernest Maltravers was now a famous man. He had more than one love affair since he lost Alice. Yet none that touched his innermost heart.

Ernest was a middle aged man and Templeton was dead before the long parting was at an end. Then Ferrers, who had grown to hate Ernest, tried to harm him by digging up his past. And in so doing he unearthed the affair with Alice; whom Ferrers easily identified as Mrs. Templeton.

But the injury he sought to wreak upon his foe turned into a blessing. Ernest, on learning where Alice was living, hastened to her. He won her forgiveness—her love had always been his.

ONLY ONE THING
A salesman who recently advised by a brother ambassador of commerce to call on a certain tradesman with whom he had no account. He took the hint, called on the man and was received most graciously.

"May I show you my samples?" inquired the salesman. "The tradesman had no objection and from an insignificant looking bag the traveler produced quite a surprising quantity of specimen goods.

"Well," said the affable storekeeper, when the bag was at last emptied, "there's only one thing I want today."

Out came the order book. "Thank you, Mr.—," remarked the salesman, delighted at opening a new account, "and what is that?"

"Why," was the reply, "I want to see how you're going to get all those samples into that little bag again."

Two Auto Accidents in the Chickies Creek Bridge on Sunday

Two slight automobile accidents occurred in one of the covered bridges over Chickies creek on the Marietta pike on Sunday. The bridge stands in such a position that in coming from either direction drivers are unable to see through the bridge.

In the afternoon Henry Rich, Jr., of Marietta, with a lot of young ladies in his car, was on his way to Columbia. Horace Detwiler, cashier of the First National bank, Columbia and a party of friends in Mr. Detwiler's car which was being driven by a chauffeur, was going toward Marietta. The two machines ran together in the bridge and each was damaged to some extent. Fortunately none of the occupants were injured. Mr. Detwiler is president of the Columbia & Marietta Turnpike Co.

A similar accident occurred in the same bridge on Sunday evening shortly after seven o'clock. Modie Heineman, of Columbia, was driving toward Marietta. J. F. Gilm of York, was driving toward Columbia. Both autos met in the bridge with the result that each machine was considerably damaged. Like the first accident no one was injured.

This bridge has always been considered a dangerous place as it is impossible on account of the turns in the pike to see approaching vehicles until almost at the opening of the structure. If the bridge was uncovered drivers could then see vehicles approaching from either end. It has been suggested that the pike company place a flagman in the bridge on Sunday during the Summer when travel is very heavy over that pike.

APHTHOUS FEVER WAS EXTENSIVE

Animals Destroyed in This County Were Valued at $235,274.90

As no new cases of apthous fever are expected to develop in our county now, none having developed for a goodly number of weeks, it may be of interest to give a little data on the epidemic, as relates to our county. The disease existed on 190 premises, among 220 herds, some places, it will be seen having more than one herd on it. The number of animals destroyed by the State and Federal inspectors were: 4,482 cattle, 1,506 swine and 66 sheep and 3 goats. The appraised value of these animals was $235,274.90, but the actual value was much greater. Considering the indirect losses sustained by our farmers and cattle dealers, the loss incurred by our county thru this epidemic is not far from half a million dollars. Property destroyed on infected places amounted to $15,281.32 and it cost to bury the carcasses, about $11,016.76.
