bulls, cattle for beeves and shoats "I brought somebody to see you," announced the small neighbor as the grown-up neighbor opened the back door. The small neighbor carefully guided a very fat little boy with a great many stuffy clothes on across the threshold. Then he stood, grinning, just outside the door. "What a cunning little somebody!" exclaimed the grown-up neighbor, as she stooped and kissed one of the small boy's bright red cheeks. "Come into the living room and sit down a while."

"Well, you know we can't stay very long," said the small neighbor when the two visitors had clambered up into two chairs. "We ran away, you

"The grown-up neighbor opened her eyes wide. "Well!" she ejaculated; "that wasn't a very nice thing to do, was it?" 'It was nicer than not doing it," said the small neighbor with decision. She shook her shoulders rather contemptuously and added: "Anyway, it was only just Frank we ran away from. You see," she went on after a mo ment, "Frank is Bobbin's brother. This is Bobbins, you know. Frank is six or nine years older than Bobbins. and he's a very bad boy."

"That's a pity," commented the grown-up neighbor. "But I suppose Bobbins is a good boy." "Oh, yes, he's good enough," agreed the small neighbor. "He's good enough now, but of course he won't be good at all when he gets as old as Frank."

"Maybe he'll keep right on being good," ventured the grown-up neighbor optimistically.

The small neighbor looked at her with pity in her eyes. "But he's a good boy," she explained, "and boys aren't ever good except when they're quite little."

"We ran away," she continued, "because Frank said that if we didn't begin to stop acting the way we were he'd 'nitiate us right that very minpike, ½ mile south of Mt. Joy, near the Union School house, a small exclaimed the grown-up neighbor, "I don't wonder you ran away. What did you do that made him threaten such a terrible thing?"

"Oh, we didn't really do anything,' said the small neighbor easily. "We just put some mud in Frank's What he threatened wasn't so very terrible, because my mother wouldn't really let him do it. But we just decided that we'd come away for a while and we were coming anyway, because I wanted you to see Bobbins. I like him, don't you? I think he's cute."

"He certainly is as cute as he can be," agreed the grown-up neighbor, while the object of their conversation stared, Buddha-like, at nothing. "He's quite little, too. I don't believe he's much more that half as big as you are." The small neighbor regarded her charge critically. "He's quite small up and down," she agreed, "but he's pretty big around, don't you think?" "Well, yes; I suppose he is. Who is said the small neighbor rather doubtfully, "but I don't see how he can be when I never say him until day before yesterday. His mother's name is Aunt Molly, and they're going to stay at our house maybe two weeks and then their daddy's coming to take

She hopped lightly down from her chair. "I guess we'll have to be going," she said. "You see, they don't know where we are and maybe they'll be wondering about it. Come on, Bob-

Bobbins rolled over on his fat little stomach and wriggled down from his chair. His masterful girl cousin took him by the hand and guided him toward the door. There she paused.

"You know," she said, looking up into the grown-up neighbor's face with wide, innocent eyes, "Bobbins didn't want to come the least bit in 'the world, so I had to tell him that sometimes you had little peppermint candies in your house and once, or maybe three times, you gave me some. Of course," she went on with a troubled look, "mother said I was never to ask you for candy, but she said if you asked me to have some I could take it. It wouldn't be polite not to, would

"It would be the height of ill-breeding," gurgled the grown-up neighbor as she hastily departed to do her duty as a hostess "Good-by, little people," she called after them a moment later as they, according to their individual methods of progression, jumped and thumped down the steps.

Thoroughly Cured. "Then you didn't ask for her hand?" "No; when I went to interview her father he was busy with the furnace. He said to come down, and after watching his struggles for half an hour I didn't want to get married."

"Then I suppose there is nothing more to say," said the young man in a most dignified manner, arising from his seat.

The young woman in the chiffon gown shrugged her shoulders delicately. "Nothing," she assurd him

"I'll go, then," he stated. "There is no object in lingering where I'm not wanted. And you've made it very clear that you wouldn't want me even if I came as a souvenir wrapped up with a box of candy."

"Your remarks were just as final," said the young woman. "There can't possibly be anything more to be added. Er-good night!"

"Good night!" said the young man, moving toward the door. As he reached the hall she spoke.

"I don't want you to think, Arthur," she said with great kindness, "that I am parting from you in anger; I shall always think of you as a friend!"

"Oh. thank you!" said the young man, acidly, coming back three steps. "I appreciate that! Only your idea of friendship is a trifle weird! You can't be very chummy with a person to whom you've said things you have have to me!" "We do not need to be chummy."

said the young woman. "Only we can speak and-er-not make it noticeable to the public."

"Oh, I see!" agreed the young man "Well, good night!"

"Good night!" said the young woman evenly. He advanced into the hall and then returned to the door. "I can't seem to find my hat," he explained. "I just wanted to say, Ethel, that you must not think I shall go through life hating you! I shall always remember you as I first thought of you—a sweet and lovely girl. I shall forget all the later developments which I hope were not your true self. Perhaps I told you my opinion a trifle harshly this evening and I beg your pardon if you feel that I did. I always want to be a gentleman even in an unpleasant situation not of my making."

"You are most kind," said the young woman, "But if you think you can lay it all off onto me your're mistaken. Arthur! I---"

"I never dreamed of doing so!" said the young man, advancing into the room. "I must be going, but I've got to stay long enough to defend myself when you make that insinuation! However, you can't deny you brought up the subject first! You wanted to know why I was lunching with Daisy Kittredge and that started it!"

"You started it when you took her to lunch!" declared the young woman. "Don't let me keep you-it's still early enough to stop in at Daisy's!" "I'm just going," said the young man, turning toward the hall quickly. "Arthur!" she called when he had neared the front door. He came back coldly polite. "I don't feel right about your leaving in this frame of mind! We probably will never have another conversation again as long as we live and I want you to go away feeling right about it. You might shake hands!"

"If you wish," agreed the young man. He looked about uncertainly. "I can't find my hat!" he repeated, looking the hall over vaguely. Then he approached her. "I agree with you, Ethel," he said with great dignity. "We will not be so foolish as to end with a childish quarrel. We are man and woman of the world enough to realize that our engagement has just been an episode toward building up our characters and careers. We will not let its ending blight our spirits. Good-by, Ethel!" He held out his

"God-by, Arthur!" she said with a sad, yet brilliant little smile, as she put her hand in his. "That is my idea exactly! The world is too full of interesting things- and other men-and girls-for us to take this seriously!"

"I'm through!" said the young man cynically. "Girls don't interest me any more! I hope, though, that you'll meet some one with whom you can be h-h-happy, Ethel!"

"Oh, Arthur!" she quavered as he pressed the hand he held in his emotion, "as though I'd ever be able to care for any one b-but you!"

"Ethel!" he said huskily as he fold ed her in his arms. "That's just the way I feel about you!" "Your hat," sobbed the young wom
