Forty-one years ago, on Saturday, this community was all excitement, and well it may have been, for on that day Marietta experienced, the biggest ice jam in the history of the town. The writer was sixteen years old then, and it was the first time he had seen the ice on the river break up. In company with two others, the three stood on a canal bridge at the Fletcher coal yards, and were about to leave, in fact all had walked off the bridge except "yours truly" who tarried to take a final look at the river, when suddenly the entire mass of ice rose rapidly and began to move down rapidly and began to move down stream. He cried out at the top of his voice "Oh, look there," and remained riveted to the spot. A deep moan came from the river from the breaking of the ice, and at the same instant his companions the same instant his comp deep mean came from the river from the breaking of the ice, and at the same instant his companions shouted "run, run, hurry," and such another demonstration of a long-legged specimen of humanity getting to a place of safety is worth paying a price to see, and well he might test his agility, for when he got to the railroad, about a hundred feet distant, the water and ice were there too. While he was making the run a canal boat that had been anchored just above the store, close to the last and the railroad and the railroad.
