In looking through a diary kept 40 years ago in July butter was 14c a pound, lard was 8c per pound, and eggs were 12c a dozen. Wheat was 95c a bushel, flour was half present cost, live chickens 10 cents a pound. This seems a big contrast with prices to-day, as the daily paper says butter is 65c, lard 32c, eggs 50c a dozen, chickens are 40 cents a pound. It would not take 40 cents to buy what $1.00 would have bought in these days. Is it any wonder that it requires a full pocket book to go to market today to buy a small basket of the necessities of life?
