FARM WOMEN STUDY DYE FOR BASKET MAKING

Rural women in some of th s a home industry, with the help of and the State agricultural colleges, are studying the harmonizing of col- noyd. ors and the utilization of homegrown or wild-dye material, such as walnut pokeberry, sumac, and many thers, to enable them to get uniorm colors. Many of these farm romen are producing beautiful baskets made of wild honevsuckle vines coral berry runners, long-leaf pine eedles, sweet grass, split oak and willow, using only materials which grow abundantly in their locality. Basketry work is taught in short courses in many of the agricultural colleges. It is carried on by farm vomen chiefly in Arkansas, Mississippi, Florida, Georgia, and Alabama, with the encouragement and assistance of extension agents.

Fighting Corn Rootworm Of all corn pests in the South, one of the most serious is the larva, or young, of the 12-spotted cucumber beetle-the so-called Southern corn root-worm. Attacked plants either die outright or are so badly stunted as to be unproductive. One control measure advised by the United States Department of Agriculture is the burning over of waste places, such as the borders and terraces of fields. Large numbers of the beetles are destroyed in this way. It should be done in the winter and on cool days when the beetles congregate in the dead grass, seeking protection from cold. The killing of one female in winter is as impartant as would be the destruction of from 400 to 600 worms in the spring.
