IMPORTED CANARIES INSPECTED AS SONGSTERS BEFORE SELLING

During the last fiscal year 154,547 canaries were imported into this country under permit. The number of canaries entered for the Christmas trade, though smaller than in years prior to the war, was more nearly normal than for some seasons past. A large proportion of the song canaries are imported from Bremen, Germany, where they are collected in the Hartz Mountains from peasants who raise them. One of the functions of the Biological Survey of the United States Department of Agriculture is to inspect all entries of foreign birds and mammals into the United States to prevent the introduction of undesirable species. Permits for as many as 17,000 canaries in different lots have been issued in a day, and single shipments of more than 3,000 birds are common.

Each canary is placed in a cage by itself at the point where the birds are gathered. These cages are set in tiers containing three cages one way and seven the other; then the tiers are placed one above the other, in a "package" about five feet high secured by strips of wood and protected by canvas. In this form the birds are shipped and are fed and watered every day of their journey. An inspector goes over the shipment when it reaches port, requiring the package to be taken apart, and the center row shown, to make sure that only healthy canaries, and nothing but canaries, are in the consignment.

It is further ascertained that each canary is a real singer, by placing the little cages in sunny windows in the importer's place of business. Those that immediately begin to sing are marked to indicate that they may be sold; the silent ones are put aside for a while, or with other singers until they, too, have been heard.

President Harding has signed a proclamation adding more than 250,000 acres to the Lemhi National Forest in Idaho.

This addition, according to a report of the Forest Service, United States Department of Agriculture, is the result of petitions made by associations in the State of Idaho who asked for protection in the use of the stock ranges which were being overgrazed and denuded by nomadic bands of sheep driven in from distant points.

The petitions resulted in a special act of Congress on March 21, 1921, authorizing the inclusion of certain described lands found by the Secretary of Agriculture to be chiefly valuable for the production of timber or the protection of stream flow.

FUR-FARMING PROBLEMS BEING SOLVED BY BIOLOGICAL SURVEY

The rapid development within the United States of the industry of rearing silver and cross foxes has necessitated particular efforts on the part of the Biological Survey of the United States Department of Agriculture to work out practical methods for handling the problems constantly confronting the fur farmer regarding the health of animals in captivity. During the year past a large percentage of the fox farms in this country and Canada were visited by representatives of the bureau for the purpose of studying practices of feeding and management employed and conditions affecting the health and fecundity of the animals, and conferring with fox ranchers regarding problems requiring solution.

Returns from a questionnaire sent out to persons engaged in the fur-farming industry in this country were incomplete but it is estimated that at least 500 ranchers are raising silver foxes in the United States, that they have between 12,000 and 15,000 foxes in captivity, and that the value of the investment is about $8,000,000.

There is indication that internal parasites of foxes are prevalent, and studies are being made to determine effective agents for their removal and improved methods of administering remedies. The most important parasites found are hookworms, roundworms, lungworms, flukes, tapeworms, and coccidia. Valuable information has been obtained as to the occurrence of such parasites among wild foxes, and investigations have been made with regard to the susceptibility of fox pups at various ages to infestation as compared with adults. Numerous other subjects relating to the health of foxes have been studied.
