The stone, center of an interestin word war among medical authorities in Canton, was anearthed by J. J. Paris proprietor of a gasoline filling station, when he was excavating, preparatory to erecting an air tank. Paris says he has refused an offer of $500 made by a physician for his find.

If the stone is declared to be the petrified head of an infant of prehistoric time, new light may be thrown on the mystery of the race of men who inhabited the American continent generations before the Indians, since, it is said, no find has dated back that far.

The skull, if it be one, is unlike that of modern men. It is flat, long and narrow. It gives the impression of having been crushed by two opposing
