G RACIA COLLINS had an enviable income. And, now that she was the sole surviving member of her family, she felt that she had a right to live as she pleased. She had always fitted her tastes to those of the family In The Civil War and it was not until the last two years that she had begun to be an individual and it was not until the last two years and express her own personality.

Her apartment was not large but it was furnished exactly as she had always dreamed her own home should be. She was appreciative of the arts, music, painting, sculpture, architecture, but her one passion was for

Today, she sat in the big cloth-covered chair beside a log fire in her library. All about her were shelves of books. A little autographed volume of Christopher Morley's lay open on her lap. She had found a line that had struck home. "Poetry must be lived before it can be either written or properly understood."

Gracia's eyes took on a glow that made her very lovely. "So-that is why I have begun to appreciate poetry of late. That is why I am secretly trying to express myself in verse," she admitted. "I have lived-I understand."

Perhaps the thoughts that tumbled one after another through her mind as she sat in the solitude of her own environment were not too tangible,
