EDITORIAL

A good many people would like to be Lindbergh now—but only a few wanted to be Lindbergh before he arrived safely at his destination.

We are unqualifiedly opposed to another amendment to the Constitution until the nation in general and the courts in particular have caught up with those we have.

IN GOOD SHAPE

Every time we pass a farm with fine buildings, up-to-date machinery, a sedan in the yard and a tractor in the field, we wonder where the farmer got his farm relief.

HOME TOWN PROGRESS

The remark is frequently made, "why don't they do this and so?" to make one's town go ahead. The idea is entertained by many, that a small group of officers of civic organizations and municipal officials are solely responsible for the development of their town, and they should take hold and push everything necessary for such development. That lays too heavy burdens on a few people.

The progress of a community depends principally upon the things that the average run of people do. We all have to take hold and help. Everyone should consider himself on a committee for that purpose. The ordinary person can help in various ways. By taking an interest in municipal affairs, and voting and working for the best candidates. By missing no opportunity to speak favorable words for his town. By keeping his own home in perfect order and giving it some touch of beauty. By doing his best on his own job, so that the business with which he is associated shall grow more prosperous.

THEY ALL CLAIM HIM

Sweden wants a visit from Charles Lindbergh, the people of that country pointing out that his name clearly proves his paternal ancestry to have been Swedish. Germany claims him, also. "Dot name 'Lindebergh'," they point out, "is a nodding but a contraction of 'Lindenberg', a family close kin to der 'Hindenberg' of der Faderland."

"Nah, nah!" comes an echo from Holland. "Dot boy's name vhas Dutch. 'Lindenburghers'—Holland vhas full o' dem feilers. He belongs to us—yah!"
"Neveaire!" says Paris. "Eet ees 'Lienbaire'—as truly French as 'Poincare.' Monseur Lienbaire has but come home when he fly to this dear Paris."

But the Scotch Genealogical Society protests. "Tak a look at his bonny hair an' his long shanks," says Sandy McTavish. "He is the livin' image o' the Mc-Lindbergh o' Scotland, where men who dare ha' been born for ages. Aye, he's Scotch, an' his name proves it."

The Irish say Lindbergh's ancestors lived in the vicinity of Lynn Bog, "Fair, an' that's how he got his name," they say. The claims of Spain, Portugal, Italy and Switzerland have not yet come in, but they are momentarily expected.

T. B. TESTING GOES FORWARD RAPIDLY
The tuberculin testing of cattle is going forward at a rapid rate throughout the United States. During March over 800,000 cattle were tested in 47 states. In all, 302 counties in 26 states have been declared free of bovine tuberculosis. This includes eight counties in Pennsylvania.

More than 17,400,000 cattle are now under official supervision for the eradication of tuberculosis. Of this number over 560,000 are in Pennsylvania.

As an indication of the interest and desire of cattle owners to have the tuberculin test made, almost 5,000,000 cattle were on the waiting list throughout the United States on April 1. There were 163,000 awaiting the test in Pennsylvania, according to the State Bureau of Animal Industry.

CEREALS IN WEINERS CAUSE ARRESTS
Using vegetable flour and cereals with artificial coloring in weiners and bologna caused the arrest of eight dealers in Pennsylvania during April, according to the monthly report of the Bureau of Foods and Chemistry, Pennsylvania Department of Agriculture.

Pure officials are determined to put a stop to the use of such "fillers" in meat products. The arrests were made in Fulton, Lawrence, Lycoming and Northampton counties.

Give Vegetables Nitrate
The leafy vegetables, such as lettuce, spinach, kale, endive, and chard will grow much more rapidly with top-dressings of nitrate of soda, say Pennsylvania State College specialists. Before cultivating sprinkle the fertilizer on the soil at the rate of 250 pounds per acre, or about one pound to 50 feet of row. Do not get the nitrate on the foliage.

Eve Edwards and Her Burglar

By CLARISSA MACKIE

EVE EDWARDS was all alone in the big empty house. Everyone expecting herself had gone to the village fair at Oakledge, and if it had not been for a severe headache, she would have been there, too.

She had chosen to lie down in the warm library, and had been asleep for several hours when the striking of the large clock awoke her. Eve yawned closed her mouth suddenly, and raised on her elbow. She listened intently for some sound that would betray the intruder—when she had gone to sleep that tall lamp at the foot of the couch had been alight.

"The thought came to her that perhaps the family had returned and had all gone to bed, forgetting that she was in the library.

"Someone is around!" she whispered, getting upon her feet.

There were footsteps in the distance, the sound of running water, the clink of a tumbler. With her heart in her throat, Eve crept down the dark hall. There was a light in the kitchen and the door was ajar.

A tall young man in a gray tweed suit was cutting a slice of bread at the kitchen table. He had found butter-meat—a cold berry pie, and was just about to sit down when he suddenly stopped, listened, and then shot a glance at the door.

"For a long moment his dark gray eyes stared into Eve's blue ones, and then he spoke.

"I beg your pardon—I did not know anybody was at home."

Eve came into the room slowly, still holding onto the door handle. She planned a swift flight if necessary—she could step back into the hall, closing the kitchen door, and thus give herself time to escape by way of the front door.

"Yes," lied Eve coolly. "We are all at home. Did you wish to see Mrs. Blaikie?"

He stared. "Mrs. Blaikie? Why not to tell the truth I never heard of Mrs. Blaikie. I came to see my brother, George Waldron—I am Philip Waldron of New York—but I found the house empty, and came in by the pane window. I was hungry, you see, and helped myself."

Eve smiled charmingly. "But, you see, Mr. Waldron does not live here. He lives on the adjoining street—W. low street."

The intruder stared incredulously. "You see," he stammered at last, "I've only been here once before, and I was directed here by somebody I met. I do not know how to apologize—really feel like a burglar, you know, breaking in that way."

"Do bring your tray into the library," urged Eve, her eyes sparkling with amusement, "and sit down where it is warm, Mr. Waldron."

"Really, I couldn't, Mrs. Blaikie," he said frankly. "I'm so embarrassed and down in the mouth, I've no appetite at all. If you can forgive me for the intrusion—" He picked up his hat and a small traveling bag.

"It is a very natural mistake," said Eve cordially. "It happens that the architecture of the two houses is very similar, and they are very near together—Mr. Waldron's place is really just around the corner."

"It is a very unfortunate incident for you, Mrs. Blaikie," said Philip Waldron. "I deeply apologize for the intrusion and hope you will allow me to call with the Waldrons some time before Monday."

"I shall be very glad indeed, Mr. Waldron. Will you leave by the front door?" Eve preceded him to the front hall and opened the front door. Then she closed it behind him and locked it and hurried to the pantry to lock that window and to peer at the Waldron house on the side street.

In a moment she was rewarded by seeing Philip Waldron's tall, straight figure marching up to the Waldrons' door. The door opened, and he was enveloped in somebody's arms. Then Eve went upstairs to dream of a pair of handsome dark eyes and a firm, decided mouth that belonged to her erstwhile burglar.

The next morning, when Eve reached the breakfast table, everybody was down.

Mr. Blaikie regarded his pretty sister-in-law with amusement. "I heard you had a beau last night, Eve."

"Why, who told you?" inquired Eve, surprised.

"You were letting him out when we came down the street," explained Mr. Blaikie. "Your headache must have been better."

"It was," Eve smiled impudently, but she would not tell them any more.

That evening the Waldrons came over and brought their brother, Philip. No one saw the amazement in his eyes when he was introduced to "Mrs. Blaikie," nor the look of joy when Eve came into the room. There was much laughter and many explanations about the enforced entry and they talked much about Eve's "burglar."

The Blaikies, because they really saw that at last pretty Eve's attention had been caught by Philip, kept very quiet about the matter, though sometimes they called him "Eve's Burglar."

Then, one May day, Eve came and whispered to Mrs. Blaikie. "Alice dear, would you object very much if I married my burglar?" and she held up her third finger where sparkled a lovely solitary ring.
