Daisy, the Little Flirt

By JANE OSBORN (Copyright.)

DAISY DREW turned the corner where the highway crossed Main street in Hinton and drew her neat little car to the curb. Then she swung lightly from her seat and walked rapidly round the car, glancing at the tires. As she passed the tires on the left she glanced with seeming nonchalance across the street. It somewhat disconcerted her that the tall young man was looking intently at her when she looked intently but quickly at him. She took time enough in starting to glance again at the young man, who had remained in the region of the corner opposite. She started her car deftly, made a quick, sharp turn and then drew up beside him on the opposite corner.

"I'm afraid you've just missed your bus," she said. "There isn't another for a half hour. I'm going out that way and I can easily overtake the bus that you've just missed, if you like." The young man doffed his hat and bowed with a little more of a flourish than was usual among the young men of Daisy's acquaintance, stepped forward and assured Daisy that it was absolutely essential for him to get the bus and that he would be profoundly grateful to her if she would take him to a point along the highway where he might overtake it.

"My name is Schuyler Wentworth," said the young man. "I am a stranger about here—I'd come out to look over a bit of property—which I find is located in—in—at the other end of the bus line."

"Barnbury," supplied Daisy. "Well, that's a half hour by motor—must be more than an hour by bus. I'm quite sure we can catch up with the bus. If you don't mind a little speed."

"Not in the least," assured the young man. They started at breakneck speed, out as they went on, getting fruit for conversation out of the objects they passed on the road. Daisy found her self slowing down. Of course, there wasn't the slightest chance that she would catch a bus, because the last bus had come nearly an hour ago and it was within five minutes' time of the next when she kidnaped the good-looking stranger at the corner. It had been a rather bold thing to do, Daisy admitted—and not the sort of thing that her sisters would have considered even decent. As a general thing, Daisy agreed with them—it wasn't safe to pick up strange young men and take them driving along the country highway to Barnbury—but the young man sitting beside her in her car was decidedly prepossessing, and if he by any chance was a desperate or dangerous character Daisy felt that in an open car with the wheel in her own hands she had every advantage.

Barnbury was in sight—and the bus had not been overtaken. It was a little settlement of some eight or nine houses, two gas-stations, a little store and the remains of an old wooden church. The young man had indicated that he had business in Barnbury. Obviously there was not much business to be done there.

"Here we are," Daisy told him. It was a desperately bold thing to do, but she told him that if his business wasn't going to take very long she would wait and carry him back to Hinton, assuming of course that he wanted to go to Hinton. But the young man did not even get out of the car. He looked at her contritely and explained that as a matter of fact he had no business whatever in Barnbury. To his surprise, the girl at the wheel showed no sign of resentment. They drove back toward Hinton in a silence that became mutually embarrassing.

"I take it for granted that you want to go back to Hinton," said Daisy, with an arch little smile. "Perhaps you have friends there?" "Not unless I might count you as a friend," said Schuyler. "The fact is I had never heard of either Hinton or Barnbury in my life until this morning. I was motoring from New York to Ohio and this morning I found myself in Hinton with some slight engine trouble which I could not attend to. I left my car in a garage and started for a little stroll. That was when I saw you—you apparently thought you had had a puncture." "Really, I didn't," said Daisy. "I only stopped my car because I thought you looked—well, a little different from the men we meet here."
