Faith Clarke's Career

By MARY GREEN (Copyright.)

IT WAS the first time in Faith Clarke's career as stenographer in the Gage Manufacturing company that she had been late. Her small purse Bro. Sale at 1:30. tomarily took the bus. She had retraced her steps, but the rapidly falling snow had hidden the place where typewriter desk to begin transcribing otes from dictation taken late the previous afternoon, Faith was aware of the fact that something of unusual interest was in the air.

Eventually Faith Clarke pieced together the information that Thomas Gage, Jr., son of "the big boss," had arrived. He had previously had charge of the western plant of the concern, but had now come to assume control of the main office and would need a private secretary.

For an hour little work was done The buzzing of voices was incessant. and there were frequent pauses in work for powdering of noses. Then hush suddenly fell on the room, for the door had opened and Mr. Mills, office manager, entered the room with a tall, keen-eyed stranger.

Never had the stenographers' room of the Gage Manufacturing company hummed with such incessant clicking of the typewriters, and never before were ten heads bent in such keen attention to work. Mr. Mills and the stranger stood talking in subdued tones, but obviously the stranger was making observations. Then they left the room and the door closed. After the noon lunch hour the girls took their places promptly. Jimmy, the office boy, came in with a message to Faith Clarke. She was wanted in Mr. Gage's office, and she departed at once, without even looking in a mirror. In spite of dry throat and trembling knees Faith Clarke took a trial letter from Mr. Gage with lightning rapidity and transcribed it in an adjoining office without a fault. "I think, Miss Clarke," he said, "that you may consider yourself advanced to the position of my private secretary. It is an advancement, because it will mean thirty-five dollars a week, and you are now getting twenty-five."

"I am sorry," Faith said slowly, "but I-if you don't very much mind;

So that was the end of that, and Mr. Gage decided to put off for another day the choosing of a private secretary. That evening after close of the office he walked for several miles in the direction of the hotel that was his temporary abode. As he the case of Faith Clarke. Why had
