HISTORY OF THE DEER PROBLEM

ARTICLE TRACES RAPID INCREASE OF ANIMALS SINCE 1896 AND REVEALS BACKGROUND

The history of the deer herd in Pennsylvania from 1896, when they were almost extinct, until their abundance made a special season for doe necessary in 1928, is discussed in detail in a bulletin now being issued by the Board of Game Commissioners.

The preliminary report on examinations of the organs of reproduction of forty-six doe is included in the report. The examinations were made by the bureau of animal industry of the Department of Agriculture, which is continuing the work. A total of 650 will be examined and the findings compiled.

The preliminary report showed that, of the forty-six examined, only three were pregnant. The preliminary findings of the bureau termed the present deer situation as one that "deserves further study," and suggested that the sportsmen voluntarily make necessary investigations. An unbalanced condition of the sexes yet exists, the report said, and added that the per cent of doe not reproducing fawns is apparently high.

Started in 1896 Tracing the growth of the deer herd, the bulletin said that, when the Board of Game Commissioners was organized in 1896, deer were so scarce that the appearance of one caused widespread comment. The first Board appointed decided to conserve what few deer remained.

The first game sanctuaries were established in 1905, and after that the deer became more plentiful. "A drastic step" was taken in 1907, when the first "buck law" was passed, the bulletin said. Digging back into its dusty files, the Board secured the evidence which showed that a protest comparable to that in 1928 regarding the killing of doe at once arose.

The thought that a hunter should be compelled to determine the sex of a deer before blazing away met with anything but approval. "The law forbidding the killing of any but a male deer with horns was passed more to protect human life than to protect deer," is a quotation made at the time by Dr. Joseph Kalbfus, the executive secretary, reproduced in the bulletin.

Nevertheless, the files of the Board show that the protests were slow in subsiding, and that as late as 1913 demands for repeal of the buck law were made. By 1920 the kill of bucks in Pennsylvania was receiving nationwide attention, and about that time protests of farmers whose crops had been damaged began to trouble the Board.

Then began moves to protect the farmers' crops. The law under which the Board furnishes wire and staples for deer-proof fences was enacted. Then came the measure which gave farmers permission to kill deer caught destroying the crops. But the protests grew rather than diminished.

The first effort to control the excess doe population in particular sections was made by declaration of special seasons. This method failed to reduce the herds. One of the instances cited is the issuance of 100 licenses in two townships of Franklin county and only eight female deer killed. The Board's plan of allowing trained deer hunters to kill large doe also raised a storm of protest from the hunters.

Following hearings before committees or both houses, the Board promised to take steps which would decrease the deer population, not only because of the crop damage, but to improve conditions for those that remain. The special season for doe deer was the outgrowth of the two decades which the bulletin covers.
