OIL CO'S EMPLOYEES GIVEN QUITE A TREAT

In line with the Schock Independent Oil Company's policy of giving their employees every possible opportunity to learn every phase of the petroleum industry the company secured an 8 reel picture put out by the Bureau of Mines, Washington, D. C. in connection with the American Petroleum Institute. Mr. Theros and his motion picture outfit were engaged to show these pictures in the Mount Joy hall on Friday evening, June 20th. All Sico employees and their families were invited to attend this meeting. About seventy employees and about sixty members of their families were present. The picture showed "The Story of Petroleum" in eight reels starting with prospectors locating oil bearing structures, tracing the whole course of the industry prospecting, drilling, refining, transporting and marketing to its end.

The pictures were very educational and were greatly appreciated by every one present.

No Wonder

Two strangers on a train got into conversation. The windows had just been let down and the desultory chatter consequently turned to the subject of ventilation.

"I make it," said one of the two, "an invariable practice to advise people to sleep with their bedroom window open all the year round."

"Ha, ha!" laughed the other; "I perceive that you are a doctor!"

"Not at all!" was the reply. "To tell you the truth, strictly between ourselves, I'm a burglar!"

Castles in the Air
 "If you have built castles in the air, your work need not be lost; that is where they should be. Now put the props under them," said Henry David Thoreau. Helen Keller says we can not always realize our ideals, but we can always realize our realities, and our ideas must be practical if we are to make a religion of them and live by them. Phillips Brooks expressed a high ideal in these words: "We reduce life to the pettiness of our daily living. We should exalt our living to the grandeur of life."

Weight of Experience Surely With Solomon

When William Jennings Bryan buttolined John Baird, to talk to him about marrying his daughter, Mary Elizabeth, in his dilemma, the young man sought refuge in the Scriptures, and began:

"Mr. Baird, I have been reading Proverbs a good deal lately, and find that Solomon says, 'Whoso findeth a wife, findeth a good thing and obtaineth favor of the Lord.'"

Mr. Baird, being something of a Biblical scholar himself, replied:

"Yes, I believe Solomon did say that, but Paul suggests that while he married doeth well, he that marrieth not doeth better."

This was disheartening, chuckled Mrs. Bryan, recalling the interview—it is reported in M. R. Werner's biography of her distinguished husband—but the young man saw his way through.

"Solomon would be the better authority upon this point," rejoined Mr. Bryan, "because Paul was never married, while Solomon had a number of wives."

After this friendly tilt the matter was satisfactorily arranged.—Kansas City Times.

How Jabez Got Revenge

By H. IRVING KING
 (Copyright.)

"IT IS indeed, a long lane that has no turning," thought Jabez Martin grimly, as he rode along the country road, bound for the farmstead of his life-long enemy, Mathew Scott. Mathew and he had been at school together—and had fought, even as little boys. Then they had grown up and had courted the same girl and Mathew had married her. Jabez never married. He devoted the rest of his life to making money—and hating his successful rival. And Mathew had prospered, too; though not to the same extent as Jabez. Mathew had gone in for apple raising and, everybody said, had made a fortune.

The prosperity of Jabez had come from cultivating mortgages and making loans at ten per cent. Also from an uncanny instinct he possessed with regard to investment in stocks. He had an office in the city and spent his time there—but he had never ceased to lay low for a chance at Mathew. And now he had him. For Mathew, instead of sticking to his apples and peaches, had been lured aside into the thorny and troublous ways of financial speculation. And there was just this difference between Jabez and Mathew—when Mathew bought any stock it went down; and when Jabez bought any it went up. Secretly, through agents of his own, Jabez had followed on Mathew's trail—and was now prepared to take his financial scalp.

Clarissa Thornton—the girl who had preferred to become Mrs. Scott rather than Mrs. Martin—had been dead a year now. Jabez's slit of a mouth grew fiercer and his little eyes glowed with a wicked gleam as he considered the things he would do to Mathew in the near future. Just then he came to where the road forked and stopped, hesitating which fork to take. It was years since he had been along that road.

"Let's see," mused he, "I think it is the right fork that goes by Mathew's. I'll ask that young man I just passed"—and he waited for the young man who was walking behind him to come up.

"Take the road to the left," said the young man; "then the first turn to the right. I'm on my way to Mr. Scott's myself. If you will allow me to jump in I'll pilot you."

Jabez fixed his eyes upon the frank, open face of the youth and a strange, inexplicable feeling came over him. Something seemed to be calling to the old man out of the past, something stirring within him feelings long dormant—dead, as he had supposed, forever. "Jump in," he said.

After a moment's silence he turned to the young man and asked: "Do you know Mr. Scott?"

"Why, yes," replied the youth with a laugh; "rather. He is my father."

"Clarissa's boy," escaped from the old man's lips in murmured tone.

"Clarissa was my mother's name," said the young man. "Did you know her, sir?"

"Yes," replied Jabez. "I knew her—and your father, too," he added grimly in his best diplomatic manner. He drove very slowly, purposely, and before they reached the Scott place he had turned the young man "inside out," as the saying is.

He had learned the old, old story of a young man and a maiden, very much in love and kept from marrying by a stern parent who was resolved that his son should marry a girl picked out for him and not the choice of his own heart. "You are quite sure that you love this Helen Barstow?" asked Jabez.

"I shall never love another woman as I do her," was the reply. "We shall marry, anyway. In this matter I cannot conform to my father's wishes. But, you see, we will have to wait a long time. I must get a little money ahead first. I must get a job somewhere, somehow. And I do hate to break with father, awfully. But it must be done."

Jabez, while talking with William, had overlooked to an extent which would have caused his business acquaintances in the city, had they seen and heard him, to conclude that the old man had lost his mind. But he hadn't; he had only changed it.

"Now, William," said he when at last they arrived at the Scott place, "show me into the parlor and go and tell your father I am waiting for him there. And don't worry about Helen. Your father and I are old—er—acquaintances. Perhaps I can persuade him."

Jabez and Mathew were closeted together for two hours. Then the conference was over a treaty had been signed which appeared to be satisfactory to both. The next day Mathew said to his son: "William, if you really are set upon marrying that Barstow girl—why, I suppose I'll have to give my consent."

"Hurrah!" cried William—and then, reflecting, "Did Mr. Martin say anything about it?"

"Why, yes," replied Mathew. "I believe that, in the course of our business talk, he did allude to something of the kind."
