The Wrong Lady

By RICHARD ROE

THE smooth road stretched out like black ribbon. There was scarcely any traffic—little by little the pointer crept around on the speedometer—Margaret felt as if she were flying. Suddenly two blinding lights came toward her and she turned out a little—a crash that sounded like the end of the world—the instinctive jangling on of brakes—a reeling ride in the field—and then the smart coupe turned over with a crash of glass. "Are you hurt?" asked a white-faced young man. "I don't think so," she said shakily; "what hit me?" "You hit me," he replied grimly, "or at least my roadster, and if I hadn't jumped you would have killed me. As it is I bet you've done five hundred dollars worth of damages on the car."

"Oh, really? Well, look at mine!" she retorted hotly. "You didn't have any lights or I wouldn't have run into you." "I did have a light and you were going entirely too fast. A car of that make never should be driven as you were driving—it isn't built for it." That was too much. To smash her car and then defame it—her lovely new pale gray coupe that had never been driven but once, Margaret's voice rose. "You had no lights and I am going to have you arrested. Where's a policeman?"

An obiding boy who loved a rumpus went off to find one and Margaret put in the interval investigating the wounds of the coupe. Finally a wrecker came up and hoisted the battered car out of the mud and departed with it forlornly trailing behind.

The bored justice of the peace holding traffic court bristled up when he saw Margaret, pretty, well-dressed and impressive. "What's the charge?" he asked solicitously.

"I parked without lights," said the policeman wearily. The justice looked shocked. "What have you to say?" he demanded sternly of the young man.

"I had lights," he replied indignantly, "until she banged into me and put 'em out." The justice, a young and personable man, looked at Margaret, prettier than ever in a rage. "It is not true," she said. She said more—considerably more—but presently she became aware that the justice seemed to be looking rather than listening. He roused himself from pleasant thought and turned to the young man. "Fined ten dollars for being parked without lights," he said.

The young man paid under bitter protest but the victory was all Margaret's. John Anderson left court with vengeance in his heart. Tomorrow he would start suit against that hateful girl and punish her insurance company if he could not punish her.

From that address she had given in court he knew that he passed her house on his way to business and his wrath blazed up afresh as he went by next morning. After he had passed he recalled that there had been a car outside the house, and with a little jar it came to him that it was the familiar car of a doctor.

At night when he went home the same car was there, and somehow his anger seemed to be evaporating. When he got home he telephoned his lawyer to do nothing about the suit until he heard from him.

The next morning the doctor was coming out of the house and John Anderson hurried up to catch him. The doctor was in a hurry and when he saw the young man's inquiring expression he replied to it. "Pretty bad today. A shock is a serious matter with a heart like Miss Willis'." And he plunged into his car, leaving a young man whose own heart suddenly felt as if it had something wrong with it.

"A shock," he reflected, "a bad heart—my gosh, the girl may die, and I'll feel like a murderer!" He sent flowers on his way home and the next day got his secretary to telephone an inquiry. The report was dubious and he rushed off to order flowers again. That was surely a bad week for John Anderson.

Margaret Willis had a trying week too, and at the end of it when the doctor said everything was safe and the patient well on the road to recovery, she decided to take a walk. "Auntie, dear, I won't be gone long, but promise me that you won't fall down stairs again while I'm out," with a gentle kiss she ran downstairs and out into the street which seemed beautiful after her confinement in her aunt's bedroom.

The trees had leafed out, tulips were in bloom. It was a gay, fresh May morning. A young man came toward Margaret with his eyes bulging out of his head. His face was one great great smile as he grasped her reluctant hand.

"Why, you're well again," he said, "and you look as strong as ever—I never was so happy in my life—if you had died I would have smashed the d-d car with an ax—the lights were really very dim because the battery was low." Comprehension dawned on Margaret and she pulled away her hand. "There weren't any lights at all or I shouldn't have bumped into you," she said. Well, they were both persons who made up their minds quickly, so six months later they were fighting over where they would go to spend their honeymoon.
