Lower Acreage In Wheat Result of Drought and Prices

Effects of the low price of 1930 wheat and of the summer and fall drought have been reflected in reduced acreage planted 'to, winter wheat, the State Crop Reporting Service announce.

The acreage planted this fall is six per cent. less than the area planted a year ago. Reports to the Penna. Department of Agriculture show farmers have planted 1.076.000 acres for next year's harvest. That is a decrease of 69,000 acres below the plantings in the fall of 1929 and 40,-00 less than was harvested in 1930. As a result, the Pennsylvania wheat harvest next year is expected to be smaller than any time in five years or more. The planting not only is for the smallest acreage in at least six years but is actually smaller than the acreage harvested at any time in the last five years. When the department Aug. 1st. in-

The condition of rye plantings was given as sixty eight per cent. December 1, which also is the lowest on record, the previous low figure being 82 per cent. in 1926. Weather conditions also account for the lower conditions of this crop.
