Proof of "Growth Ray"

Gains, Scientist Says

The existence of "Growth Rays," by means of which the growth of human beings, animals and plants could be stimulated, has yet to be proved, but evidence of its existence is increasing daily, according to Prof. A. M. Low, British scientist.

"I believe it is still too soon to announce the discovery of what one might describe as 'Mitogenetic' rays, although research work in this direction so far only confirms the belief which I myself have held for many years—based on my fermentation experiments—that life may be affected by both known and unknown rays."

In an interview in London with the United Press, Low discussed the possibility (suggested in an article in the scientific weekly, Archmal Science) that certain rays may stimulate growth.

"The existence of 'Growth Rays' has been suspected for many years past," he explained, "and experiments have been conducted and are being conducted which would tend to confirm the suspicion. Several years ago, for instance, it was shown that the growing root of an onion gave off something which could travel through air and increase the multiplication of cells in another onion root."

The effect of the suspected rays is all the more remarkable, he continued, because, he said, even if a plate of quartz is placed between the roots the action persists. Nor does water interfere with the progress of the rays, thick glass or gelatin being the only thing which seems to affect it.
