NATIVE OF DONEGAL QUITE A BUILDER

(From page 1) Cameron lived to be about ninety but people think of him now only as a political leader. But the first half of his life he was, like Franklin, the busiest man in Pennsylvania, for he was a builder and a big one—a dominant figure in the early railroading of the state.

Simon Cameron was born March 8, 1799, Maytown, Lancaster county. He inherited his fighting qualities for which he became famous from the Camerons of Scotland, who shared their fortunes with the unfortunate Charles Edward.

Those were stormy days for the young king who was the son of James Stuart, the first Pretender. Unlike his father and grandfather, he was talented and firm of purpose. As a boy he served in the Spanish army against Austria. On the breaking out of the war between England and France, in 1744, the French furnished him with a powerful fleet and an army under the command of Marshal Saxe, the greatest soldier of the time, with which to secure the throne of the Stuarts. The expedition, however, was driven back by storms.

After that the French refused to let him try again but he managed to collect enough funds to fit out two small vessels. There can be no doubt that a part of the funds were furnished by Simon Cameron's ancestors.

One of the ships was driven off by a British cruiser but the second bore Charles to Scotland, where an army of Highlanders slowly gathered about him. Among these were the Camerons who bought with him in his throne-seizing venture only to suffer reverses sometimes later.

With his army Charles destroyed an English division sent against him at Prestonpans.

This victory gave him such a reputation that he marched through England to within 100 miles of London which he could have captured, but the Highlanders, becoming alarmed, forced him to retreat. After winning the battle of Falkirk, January 17, 1746, his Scottish chiefs forced him again to retreat to the Highlands where the disastrous defeat of Culloden ruined his cause.

He might have won this battle, too, though his army was smaller than that of the English, had not the McDonald clan on the left wing refused to charge, sulking because they had always had the honor of hoisting the right since the battle of Bannockburn.

After months of wandering and adventure, Charles escaped from the country. He never took the title of Europe as the Count of Albany, until his death at Rome, in 1788.

Thus the Cameron's star of hope sank on the battle field of Culloden. Donald Cameron, Simon Cameron's great grandfather, was a participant in that memorable battle and, having escaped the carnage, made his way to America in 1745.

On his maternal side, Cameron was descended from Conrad Pfutz, one of those sturdy German Protestants, whose faith no terrors could conquer. An exile from his native land for conscience sake, he sought the western wilds and was, for a time, the companion of that famous Indian fighter, Captain Samuel Brady, the history of whose life is more captivating than romance.

When Simon Cameron was about nine years old his parents moved from Lancaster county to Northumberland county and his father dying soon after, he was early thrown on his own resources. Young Cameron liked books and his fondness for reading was unquenchable. The little printing shop in Sunbury soon became a mecca for him and in 1815 he became an apprentice to the printing trade.

His employer, however, suffered reverses and his office was closed. This threw Cameron out of work and he was forced to look for another job. Soon afterward he went to Harrisburg where after considerable disappointment, he secured a job as apprentice in the office of James Peacock.

When he was 21 years old Cameron located at Doylestown, Pennsylvania, and in January, 1821, began the publication of the "Berks County Messenger."

In March of the same year he entered into partnership with the publisher of the "Doylestown Democrat" the publication of which was continued until the close of the year 1821, when the paper was sold to General W. T. Rogers.

More determined than ever, Cameron again took up the trail, finally returning to Harrisburg, where he obtained a position as journeyman printer. Not long after this he became an employe of the firm of Gales and Seaton, in Washington, D. C., publishers of the "National Intelligencer."

In 1823, Cameron returned to his native state and was married to a Miss Brus, of Harrisburg. In the same year he became one of the publishers of the "Report" a Democratic paper printed in Harrisburg. He also was elected State printer and received from Governor Andrew Schulze, another native Lancasterian, the appointment of Adjutant General of Pennsylvania.

The poor printer was now become a man of mark. His official and business connections introduced him to the leading men of the state and he soon came to be recognized as one of the shrewdest business men of the whole country.

Cameron early became conspicuous in the public improvement enterprises of the state and the projection of his Harrisburg, Mount Joy and Lancaster railroad. It was at this time that his inherent fighting qualities came to the fore.

Railroads in the early stages of development were looked upon with disfavor and the support of which, in any marked degree was a waste of time and money. But to Cameron, railroads meant prosperity and individual gain. In fact, his vision was far in advance of his associates. His energy and ability was therefore largely responsible for the completion of this public project.

In recognition of his efficiency as a builder, he was chosen president of the road. The Lebanon Valley railroad, was another movement to his sagacity and foresight. Not content with these successes, he developed the Northern Central railroad, from Harrisburg to Sunbury.

When only 27 years of age he had a contract to construct the canal from Harrisburg to Sunbury, a distance of about 60 miles. This and other improvements were sufficient to give him front rank among the useful and enterprising citizens of the commonwealth.

In 1831, Louisiana sent him to build the pioneer canal from Lake Pontchartrain to New Orleans. The thrifty Pennsylvania Scotchman took an army of 1200 workmen from Philadelphia to help do the work. This achievement, which was culminated successfully, brought him added recognition as a builder.

In 1845, after the inauguration of James K. Polk, the position of Secretary of State was tendered to another famous Lancasterian, James Buchanan, then one of the United States senators from Pennsylvania in Congress. A successor was to be chosen to fill Buchanan's place in the Senate. Simon Cameron was the man who, at this time, in recognized sympathy with the Democratic party, was selected for the policy of a protective tariff. George W. Woodward was, however, the caucus nominee of the Democrats; this party being at the time strongly in the majority.

The Whigs consented to unite their strength upon Cameron because of his therefore, of the Whigs and a part of known tariff sympathies. By the union, the Democrats, he was elected to the United States Senate. In 1857 he again was a candidate for the Senate and succeeded in being elected over John W. Forney, then universally conceded as one of the shrewdest Democratic politicians in the state.

Upon the election of Lincoln, in 1860, the distant sound of the approaching Civil War became instantly audible on the southern horizon. As soon as the new president assumed the helm of state on March 4, 1861, and began to look around him for those in whom he should repose his councils in the troubled state of the nation the name of Simon Cameron stood out in bold relief.

He was chosen as Secretary of War by Lincoln at a time when the destiny of the nation was in great jeopardy—a fitting tribute to his integrity and ability. Thus, seventy years ago, a Lancaster countian assumed the herculean task of organizing plans for the mobilization of the United States army, at a period when all signs indicated an unprecedented hurricane upon the American continent.

It came with the bombardment of Fort Sumter, on the morning of April 12, 1861. Immediately the bugle blasts of war arose and the period which followed required of Cameron a coolness, sagacity and vigor of will that the exigencies of the nation had never before demanded.

General Cameron at once evinced his appreciation of the magnitude of the difficulties to be encountered and a characteristic determination of resistance that the crisis required. In accordance with his plans an army was soon organized and the northern states were placed upon a military footing that amply shielded and assured the perpetuity of the Federal Union.

The position was, however, a perplexing one for even the steadiest of nerves. In 1862, therefore, Cameron was forced to retire from the post and was appointed Minister to Russia.

In 1867 he was elected for the third time to the United States Senate. His early exploitations in finance, engineering were achievements which rank high in the history of the country. They were the means of developing one of the richest sections of the United States.

For sixty years Cameron was a forceful figure. Perhaps he needs no other monument than the Northern Central railroad, of which he was the builder and of which his son was long president.
