Tenderfoot Showed Them Something

By JACK MORD

(© by McClure, Nichol & Lynde.)

"I WAS in New York that Marvin first met Eulalia. I had never seen a girl like her before. He couldn't imagine, at first, what it was about her that was so strangely different.

She was not palely beautiful, as most of the girls he knew were—like hot house flowers. She was ruddily, healthily beautiful. Her lithe, slim figure had a brisk swing to it as she walked. Her hair seemed to have been dyed by the sheer gold of sunlight itself. Her teeth were perfectly matched pearls. She was so pretty she made him gasp. And then meeting her, dancing with her, taking her to a show or two, he began to understand.

She was a girl from the "wide open spaces," such as he had never seen before. That strength and power in her lovely, bright eyes came, doubtless, from looking along wide vistas; that glow in her cheeks was from early morning rides over her father's ranch. Marvin fell madly, desperately in love; so much so, in fact, that he followed Eulalia back to Arizona, to be near her.

Eulalia's father welcomed him, but just a bit derisively, until he learned that Marvin could ride. Then he provided him with a horse, and they all got ready to start out together.

Eulalia's father's foreman was to ride with them over the range. The foreman was a husky, roughly handsome man that Marvin could see was in love with Eulalia; Eulalia, Marvin noticed, viewed the foreman with at least admiration, perhaps for his rugged manliness. Marvin had to admit that he didn't cut much of a figure in the ranch picture.

Trouble started as soon as Marvin mounted his horse. He had never felt such horse muscles under him before; the horses he had ridden through Central park were, he realized now, almost toy mounts as compared with this one.

"The horse reared, Marvin fell backward sprawling in the dust. The foreman and Eulalia and her father were most solicitous; but he could see the glint of contemptuous amusement in their eyes when they glanced at Eulalia: the glances seemed to say: "Is this supposed to be a man?"

And so it went, day after day. In New York, Marvin remembered, he had made some progress in Eulalia's affections; but here... her interest in him seemed to be wavering. He was heartbroken; for she was the one girl for him, he knew. Not that she actually was contemptuous of him because he couldn't ride horses, and couldn't get along in the ranch country... but somehow because he did not show up bravely, in juxtaposition with her father and the foreman. At last, desperate, he spoke to New York over the long distance telephone. A day and a half passed, and a buzzing was heard over the ranch.

"That's funny," Eulalia's father said, "must be a mail plane off its route."

"Not at all," Marvin corrected; "just my plane I had sent down. Thought you'd all like a trip in the air—that," he added pointedly, since the foreman was present, "unless you're afraid."

The foreman turned visibly pale; Eulalia's father looked startled; but he frowned. Eulalia was ecstatic. She said: "A ride in a plane! Marvelous. And of course Don and Dad aren't afraid; they've both often admitted to me that there isn't anything in the world they're afraid of." After that, there was no question about the ride being a foursome.

It was mean, Marvin had to admit, to turn tail spins and do barrel rolls; but, after all, they had deliberately provided him with an almost unrideable horse. At the end of the ride Don and Dad were wrecks!

"Never again!" Don swore, trying to make his legs behave so he could walk away from the plane as fast as possible.

"I'm too old to learn new tricks like that," Eulalia's father declared without reservations; "though I envy you youngsters growing up in this generation."

It was as they walked after supper, with the chromatic tints of the sunset's afterglow painting the raw land in rosy colors, that Marvin said: "Honey, I'm wild about ranch life."

"And I'm crazy about city life," she admitted; "though I sometimes thought maybe city men were puny as compared with western plains men. But as compared to running a plane, busting a broncho is child's play."

"How about our incorporating," he suggested, "and spending our time fifty-fifty, ranch and city?"

"A swell idea," she echoed. The man in the moon saw their embrace and approved, even if, in the distance, a jackal did howl disapprovingly.

St. Paul's Age Unknown

The exact date of St. Paul's birth is not known, but it is supposed to have been between the years 5 and 10 of the Christian era. As it is believed that Christ was born some four years previous to the date from which we count our years, it is to be supposed that Paul was from nine to fourteen years younger. Paul was born at Tarsus, in Asia Minor, but was sent to Jerusalem to be educated. He was headed at Rome in the year 67 or 68, during one of the persecutions of the Christians under Emperor Nero.

USE OF FORESTS BY PUBLIC SHOWS STEADY INCREASE

Recreational use of Pennsylvania State Forests is growing steadily. More than 1,500,000 people visited these 1,500,000 woodland acres during 1931, of which number 250,000 were hunters and 100,000 fishermen, John W. Keller, deputy secretary, Department of Forests and Waters, said today.

Several reasons were cited by Keller for the increased use by the public of the State forests, parks and public camps. The mounting mileage of hard surfaced highways and the larger numbers of motor vehicles contributed greatly to the influx of visitors. But the principal cause, he said, is the ever growing tendency of the people of Pennsylvania to spend more time in nature's out of doors.

In view of this very definite urge on the part of people in all walks of life to get out into the woods, the forestry officials are keeping abreast of the movement by providing greater facilities for recreational use and comfort. Maps, showing roads, trails and streams, are now available for most of the State Forests. Parks and public camps are designated for easy location by visitors.

These areas are equipped with tables and benches, fireplaces, pure water, parking space, and other facilities for the convenience of the public. Well marked trails radiate from them into the surrounding forests. These features make it possible for increasing thousands to enjoy the outdoor life in a forest environment at moderate cost.

POLICE MAKE 1197 ARRESTS IN MONTH

The Pennsylvania State Police during November made a total of 1197 arrests for all grades of crime. These include three arrests for murder, nine for arson, eighteen for robbery, 316 for larceny, and 686 for lesser crimes. Stolen property valued at $24,598.55 was recovered and returned to owners. One hundred and sixty-five arrests were made for violation of the prohibition laws.

Patrols of the State Police covered practically every county in the State, and special night patrols were made where complaints indicated that holiday poultry thieves were active.
